

LIBRARY OF PRINCETON

MAY 11 2005

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2014

CHRISTIANITY
THE LOGIC OF CREATION

BY
HENRY JAMES

AUTHOR OF
"THE CHURCH OF CHRIST NOT AN ECCLESIASTICISM," ETC.

"Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas,
Atque metus omnes et inexorabile fatum
Subiecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari."

VIRGIL.

LONDON
WILLIAM WHITE, 36 BLOOMSBURY STREET
1857

LIBRARY OF PRINCETON

MAY 11 2005

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

LONDON :
PRINTED BY MITCHELL AND SON,
WARDOUR ST., OXFORD ST.

PREFACE.

THE following Letters were actually written to a friend in London, and are published at his suggestion. They are themselves but a preface to a larger discourse upon the same theme, which the writer hopes some day to accomplish. Christianity was the revelation of an utterly unsuspected life of God within the strictest limits of human nature; and, like all true revelation of spiritual things, was an inverse form of its own interior substance. For this is the distinction between revelation, properly so called, and information, that the one constitutes an inverted image of the truth, the other a direct image; or that the one is symbolic and speaks mainly to the soul, while the other is purely statistical and addresses chiefly the senses. Hence it is that revelation has always shielded and fostered human freedom, while mere information is sure to crush it. None of the sects exhibit so servile a temper as those who pretend to the most authoritative information about spiritual things. Look at the Swedenborgians, for example. And Mediumship, as it is called, is growing to be the aspiration and profession of thousands, who are not ashamed to depose their proper human force and faculty, in order to become the unresisting puppets of a remorseless spiritual jugglery.

The life which Christ revealed has of course always been operative in the unseen depths of human experience, or in what we call the spiritual world. But it is now becoming, if not sensibly, at all events scientifically, discernible in the astonishing phenomena of man's æsthetic or spontaneous action. This is the momentous lesson with which all history is fraught: yet none are so utterly inattentive to it as our ecclesiastics and politicians, who, of all living persons, should be the most interested to give it diligent heed and furtherance. The theory of their eminent place binds them fairly to interpret history: if they persistently fail to do this, it is only because history has escaped from their keeping, and is transacting itself in far more hopeful and veracious quarters. Only the craziest scaffolding of ecclesiastical and political routine still hides from our gaze the majestic human house God has been silently building up from the beginning: doubtless some sharp revolutionary jolt will ere long prostrate that crazy scaffolding, and bring us face to face with the kindly and eternal reality.

Paris, July 1, 1857.

LETTER I.

Paris, Sept. 17th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

I AM obliged to you for the pamphlets in relation to the doctrine of Christ's glorification; but it is very clear to me that the disputants have no just conception of the spiritual scope of Christianity. They appear both alike immersed in the clouds of the letter, and obviously regard Christianity as concerned—even as to its spiritual contents—only with certain personal facts about Christ. The letter of revelation is of course constituted by those facts: but unless I am greatly deceived, our disputants view its substance or spirit as somehow subject to the same limitation. If I should ask them what the Lord is according to the spiritual sense of the word, I fear that they would feel logically bound to answer that "He is a finite person like you or me, only inconceivably elevated and glorious, existing in the spiritual world as a monarch exists in his kingdom, and thence ruling the natural world."

But this is a total misconception of the true state of the case. Viewed literally, the Lord was an historic person, the most finite and dejected of men. Viewed spiritually, however, he is the life of universal man, existing nowhere but in the individual soul conjoined with God. To the spiritual apprehension the Lord is not a finite historic person, capable of being outwardly discriminated from other persons: He is the infinite Divine love and wisdom in union with every soul of man. He has no existence or personality apart from such union. You Swedenborgians are wont to talk of the glorification of the human nature in the Christ, as of certain phenomena which transpired within the spatial limits of Christ's body, and remain permanently confined to those limits throughout eternity, thus practically turning the Christ into a mere miracle, or Divine tour de force, fit for Barnum's museum of curiosities. I am persuaded that nothing more baldly sensual exists out of Heathendom, than much of this prevalent orthodox lore. Swedenborg tells us with all his might that time, space and person, are unreal existences: that real existence is of an intensely human quality, being made up exclusively of affection, and of thought derived from that affection: and yet his reputed followers go on to cogitate the spiritual world as compounded of space, time, and person, precisely as if he had never uttered a word upon the subject. "Not any person," says Swedenborg, "named in the Word is perceived in heaven, but instead thereof the thing which is represented by that person.”—A. C., 5225. “There are three things,” he says, “which perish from the literal sense of the Word, while the spiritual sense is evolving, namely whatsoever pertains to time, to space, and to person. The conception of time and space perishes, because these things are peculiar to nature, and spiritual thought is not determined to person, because a view to person in discourse contracts or limits the thought, and doth not render it unlimited: whereas what is extended and unlimited in discourse gives it universality, and fits it to express things innumerable and ineffable. Angelic discourse, especially that of the celestial angels, is of this character, being comparatively unlimited, and hence it connects itself with the infinite and eternal, or the Divine of the Lord.”—A. C., 5253. See also 5287, 5434.

Yours truly,

LETTER II.

Paris, Sept. 29th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

YOU ask me to be a little more explicit in stating my views of New Church truth. I am not aware that there is anything recondite in my views. Ever since I knew Swedenborg's books I have of course been put upon my guard against my naturally sensuous and irrational views of creation. No doubt one learns wisdom slowly, but I may truly say that I no longer incline to regard creation as a physical act of God, and have ceased attributing to Him material modes of being. I feel, indeed, a hearty disrelish of the popular cant which, while professing to maintain the spiritual contents of the Scriptures, perpetually degrades the Divine creation, redemption, and providence, into mere historic problems like the French Revolution or the Battle of Waterloo. If the design of the New Testament be to give us historical information, no book was ever more undivinely constructed. Robinson Crusoe is a masterpiece of skill beside it, and the American spūks and tabletippers, though their talk be only of the dreariest millinery and mud of things, are yet more luminous than evangelists and apostles. No doubt all spiritual truth falls at last into the historic plane, in order that it may become cognizable in that disguise to unspiritual or natural eyes. And the Divine creation, redemption, and providence, obey of course this universal law. But how base must we deem the intelligence, which insists upon viewing the spiritual truth as identical with its historic ultimatum! How base, in other words, must we consider that spiritual state which regards a Divine operation as observing strictly personal limits, or shutting itself up to the experience of an individual bosom. Thus I have often been checked, in speaking of the Incarnation as a scientific verity, by the suggestion that "the Incarnation took place only in the Christ, and could be true therefore only of his experience."

But those who talk in this way, under the impression that they are honouring the Lord, might much more profitably employ their energies in "whistling jigs to a milestone." Depend upon it, the milestone will up and dance, long before any angel will be caught in that foolish trap. It is a trap, and nothing more. The idea is that in honouring Christ personally we honour Him spiritually, and so shall get to be honoured by Him. There is no persuasion more puerile. We honour Christ spiritually only by forgetting every personal and liminary fact about Him, or rather by seeing in these facts only their universal spiritual meaning, the meaning they reflect upon universal man in relation to God. All the literal facts—Christ's life, death, and resurrection,—are unspeakably precious—why? Because they contain some magical virtue? Assuredly not, but only because they reveal a truth which they do not constitute, a truth which relates universal man to God. Spiritual Christianity drops out the carnal Jesus, or no longer sees Christ after the flesh. It drops the man born of the virgin Mary, six feet high more or less, of an uncomely aspect, bent and seamed with sorrow, to see henceforth the glorified or Divine Man who is the intimate and omnipresent secret of creation. Spiritually viewed, Christ is the inmost and vital selfhood of every individual bosom, bond or free, rich or poor, good or evil, whether such bosom be reflectively conscious of the truth or not. But in saying this I should be very sorry to be understood as saying, that the literal Man Jesus of Nazareth becomes lifted out of His native environment, and personally inserted in every individual bosom. This would be too absurd. What then do I mean? I mean simply to indicate the spiritual significance of the Christ. I mean to say that the birth, life, death and glorification of Christ spiritually imply, that infinite love and wisdom constitute the inmost and inseparable life of man, and will ultimately vindicate their creative presence and power by bringing the most degraded and condemned forms of humanity into rapturous conscious conjunction with them. When I think spiritually of the Christian truth, I do not think of Jesus personally, except as it were to anchor or define my thought. I think quite away from Him personally indeed, and fix my attention upon what is universal to man, or upon the life of universal human fellowship which the Divine love is now engendering in your bosom and mine, and that of all other men, by the stupendous ministry of science. The Christian facts attest, reveal, predict this universal spiritual life of man, this redemption of the natural mind, because they are a real ultimatum of it. Every incident of Christ's personal history grew out of this unseen and unknown Divine operation in humanity, and were thus a mystical and endless revelation of it, such a revelation as human intelligence permitted. There could have been no scientific information upon the subject of course, because no angel even knew the wonders of the Divine love implied in the intimacy of His conjunction with human nature. By the very necessity of the case, therefore, the great and inscrutable truth could only look forth under a veil, and wait for the gradual unfolding of human reason to be discerned in its just spiritual proportions. That just discernment is now taking place. Men are everywhere now beginning to drop the tedious cant of mere per- sonal homage to Christ, and insist upon finding a universal humanitarian meaning in His truth, a meaning which shall vitally associate with God every man of woman born, whatever be his natural limitations and infirmities.

Thus the Divine Incarnation is with me a spiritual truth before—or, in order to its—becoming a natural one. I value the natural facts only because they contain something higher and better than themselves, something which relates you and me and all mankind to the inmost and exhaustless heart of God. The entire history of the church from Adam to Christ inclusive, is only a series of effects from a real Divine operation in the spiritual world, which is the universal mind of man; and your and my spiritual experience with that of our remotest natural descendants, constitute the substance of that world, quite as much as does that of Moses or David. The spiritual world, or the mind of man, is out of space and time; and all God's alleged spiritual judgments which were expressed or ultimated in the life of Christ, claim your and my bosom for their veritable ground or arena, quite as much as they do that of any one who died before Christ. Thus we can spiritually understand Christianity only in so far as we rightly apprehend the life which is taking place in our own bosoms and that of our contemporaries. All the Swedenborgs who ever lived will not avail us here, but only the clear and reverential insight into what God is now effecting in the universal mind of man. I for my part see, very clearly, that God is begetting by the ministry of science such a recognition of human society, fellowship, or equality in the bosom of man, as that bosom has never conceived, much less known, and can never again lose sight of: such a recognition, indeed, as must ere long prostrate every throne and altar now erected upon the twin dogmas of human inequality and depravity, and by means of such prostration bring the whole disunited family of man into conditions of mutual knowledge, love and reverence. And seeing this, I see that such and no less is the spiritual force of Christianity: that this boundless blessing of God upon man's natural life, and by means of that upon his spiritual life, is the great and universal burden of the Christian letter, and I consequently value that letter not with any servile estimation, but with the hearty relish of one who has tasted its endless and ineffable spiritual contents.

Yours truly,

LETTER III.

Paris, Oct. 1.

MY DEAR W.

THE great disease of the religious mind at present is, that it obstinately persists in looking upon religion as a private question instead of a public one, as an affair of the individual conscience instead of the associated one. One is not surprised at the old sects continuing in this traditional way, but I am surprised that you, who read Swedenborg, should not have begun to get out of it, for Swedenborg shews us in every page of his books, that revelation proceeds upon strictly universal principles, and that not one single word of it is to be spiritually interpreted in a private or personal sense.

The old theory of religion is that God is a respecter of persons, that He approves one sort, the morally good, and saves them; and disapproves another sort, the morally evil, and damns them. Viewed spiritually, of course this is arrant superstition, because all men are alike worthless in the Divine sight, the morally good and the morally evil; and God would quite as gladly, therefore, bless one as the other, only that the morally good man, in consequence of the conceit he derives from the general estimation in which he is held, will not permit himself to be blessed. These are they, who being secure of the honour that comes from men, do not aspire after that which comes solely from God. "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter the Divine kingdom." And Swedenborg shews you that no angel in heaven ever feels himself rich in comparison with others, without, ipso facto, tumbling into infernal company. Still the church has maintained itself in the world hitherto on this most sandy foundation. It has always been thought that there was an essential difference between the saint and the sinner, and that the distinction between heaven and hell was measured by that difference: so that practically what we have all sought to do in order to merit heaven has been, to make ourselves different from certain other people, whom the world cheerfully consigns to hell. In this manner the ecclesiastical temper has proved to be one of intense Pharisaism and self-righteousness, filling the world of spirits with all manner of flatulent falsity and obstruction. The last judgment, as Swedenborg proves, had exclusive reference to these pestilent and cruel moralists. See his little book on the Last Judgment, 69, with the Con- tinuation, 10, 16: and also the Doctrine of Faith of the New Jerusalem, 64.

No intelligent reader of Swedenborg ought to fail to perceive how low this temper is, and how utterly repugnant to the genius of the spiritual dispensation. According to Swedenborg, there is no essential difference between saint and sinner, angel and devil; in fact, there is no actual difference, even, save what is made by the one acknowledging the Lord and the other not doing so. According to the unvarying testimony of this enlightened man, it is the Lord alone who, by His presence inwardly in the angel, causes him to be an angel, and by His absence inwardly from the devil, suffers him to be a devil. Now what does Swedenborg mean when he speaks in this way? What does he mean by the LORD who is inwardly present or absent from man? Does he mean a literal person, capable of outward or sensible discrimination from other persons? Surely this would be ridiculous, for no man nor angel could possibly exist with an additional person to himself included in his own skin. By the Lord regarded spiritually or rationally, then, we do not mean any literal or personal man, capable of being sensibly comprehended; but we mean that Divine and universal life in man, which grows out of the conjunction of the infinite Divine Love with our finite natural loves, and which was perfectly manifested and ultimated in the Christ, considered as the end of the old or carnal economy, and the beginning of the new or spiritual one. Christ was conceived of the Holy Spirit, born of the virgin mother, lived, died, and rose again, only by virtue of this latent Divine life in humanity waiting to develop itself in the fulness of time, and seeking meanwhile to give itself intellectual anchorage or projection by all those literal facts. Had there not been a realm of life stored away in the still unsunned depths of human nature, unperturbed by human folly, unstained by human sin, a realm of life in which the Divine Love reigns supreme, attracting the cordial, and glad, and boundless homage even of our most natural and selfish loves, then Christianity must have proved an illusion and abortion. For the glorification of the Christ, which is its great truth, obviously pre-supposes the spontaneous subjection of self-love to charity, or hell to heaven, and of heaven to the Divine : and when self-love is spontaneously subject to brotherly love, human nature is redeemed, and every man becomes thenceforth naturally conjoined with God. I do not say that every one thereby becomes spiritually regenerate, for spiritual regeneration, or new birth, implies the existing disjunction of the Divine and human natures, and has never taken place except by the Divine power constraining man's obedience. I only say that he becomes naturally redeemed, so that his nature will no longer prove an obstacle, but only a help to his spiritual progress. In the past history of the world, men have been regenerated only by the Lord's power, working in opposition to their nature; and very few, consequently, have been regenerated. And the heights to which the regenerate have attained, no doubt have been comparatively below those to which they will attain in the future by the reconciliation of the natural principle.

No one has ever been regenerated in the least degree, save by virtue of the Lord's life in man, that is to say, by virtue of the essential humanity of God, and the ultimate complete redemption which that humanity implies for our nature. Had this redemption been impracticable, there could have been no basis for the regeneration even of the very few who have been regenerated in the past. (See what Swedenborg says, and especially promises, without however performing, in his Coronis, 21, particularly VII.) Regeneration is only a type of the Lord's glorification, or of the Divine NATURAL man, and has no significance underived from that. There is no angel in any heaven at this moment, who enjoys his appropriate bliss by any other tenure than the truth of the Divine NATURAL humanity, or of that perfect union between the Divine and the human, the infinite and finite, which takes place in the spontaneous depths of the soul, and which is now overturning all things in heaven and earth, in order that it may shine forth in unclouded splendour.

The spontaneous life of man is as yet obscured under vicious institutions. It is the life which science alone inaugurates. It most strictly presupposes (and must therefore never be confounded with) 1. The instinctual or animal life, the life of infancy in man, in which the passions dominate the intellect: nor, 2. With the voluntary or moral life, the period of adolescence in man, in which the reason learns to transcend the passions, and rules them by truths. It supervenes only when the course of these things has been run, and man weary of being his own Providence, filially submits himself to the Divine. Instinct is born of the passions ruling the intellect. Will is born of the intellect ruling the passions. The spontaneity is born of a perfect marriage or union between the two, causing all conflict to disappear.

Yours truly,

LETTER IV.

Paris, Oct. 6th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

WE are informed that Christ's flesh saw no corruption, and we know that He told His disciples, after His resurrection, to handle His body and make sure that He was no spirit, but an actual flesh and blood man, just as they had always known Him. Swedenborg says that the difference between this glorification of the Lord and ordinary regeneration, or, what is the same thing, between the Divine natural man and the angel, is the exact difference between being and seeming, between substance and shadow, between reality and semblance or appearance. Christ's experience was peculiar, or different from the angel's, in this—that He glorified Himself, or united His natural selfhood with the Infinite Divine Love. The angel in regeneration does not glorify himself, but the Lord : that is to say, his natural selfhood becomes laid aside, and a new one divinely substituted in its place, so that instead of uniting himself naturally with God, as Christ did, the angel perpetually remits or rejects his natural selfhood to the devil, and receives from the Lord an absolutely new self thereupon. Christ overcomes hell by His own proper power or manhood, whereas the angel would be incontinently overcome of it, if he were not sedulously preserved by the Divine power, vanquishing his incessant natural gravitation towards hell. In short, Swedenborg affirms that he found no angel in any heaven, however elevated, who was not in himself, or intrinsically, of a very shabby pattern, and who did not, therefore, cordially refer all his goodness and wisdom to the Lord ; and he sets it down as the fundamental principle of their intelligence, that they ascribe all their good to the Lord, and all evil to the devil. No matter what heights of manly virtue the angel may have reached, no matter what depths of Divine peace and contentment he may have sounded, Swedenborg invariably reports that in himself, or intrinsically, he is replete with every selfish and worldly lust, being in fact utterly undistinguishable from the lowest devil. Was ever testimony so loyal as this? Was ever honest heart or seeing eye so unseduced before by the most specious shows of things? I confess the wonder to me is endless. What other man in that rotten and degraded generation was capable of such devotion to humanity? Of which one of his contemporaries could you allege, that being admitted to the most lustrous company in the universe, being associated with men of an incomparable worth, and women of an ineffable loveliness, and seeing on every hand the noblest manners and behaviour, instinct with freedom, and flanked by every resource of boundless wealth and power, he would never for an instant lose his balance, or duck his servile head in homage, but stedfastly maintain his invincible faith in the great truth of human equality? George Washington is doubtless an unblemished name to all the extent of his commerce with the world; but how puny that commerce was, compared with this grand interior commerce of the soul; and how juvenile and rustic his virtue seems beside the profound, serene, unconscious humanity of this despised old soldier of truth! To gaze undazzled upon the solar splendours of heaven, to gaze undismayed upon the sombre abysses of hell, to preserve one's self-respect, or one's fidelity to the Divine name, unbribed by the subtlest attractions of the one sphere, and unchilled by the nakedest horrors of the other, implies a heroism of soul which in no wise belongs to the old Church, even in its highest sanctities, and which leaves the old State, even as to its most renowned illustrations, absolutely out of sight.

But I am digressing. Our business, thank God, is not with Swedenborg or General Washington, or any other person, however eminent, but solely with the difference between the Lord and the angel, or the Divine natural and the Divine celestial man ; in short, between the fully glorified and the merely regenerate aspect of human nature. The difference is indeed enormous, and obvious, moreover to the least reflection. The Divine celestial man is comparatively impotent or imperfect, because the angel in whom he is manifested, is not positively good, is not good in himself, but good only by undergoing a process of defecation, that is, by eliminating evil, or precipitating the hells. The Divine celestial humanity, or the Lord as embodied in the angel, has only an imperfect ability to subject evil to His obedience ; He has power to cast it out, to separate it from good, but not completely to subjugate it to Himself. This latter power inheres only in the Divine natural humanity. Thus the hells are so much waste or refuse human force, so much Divine virtue turned to mere excrement, by the inability of the natural man perfectly to unite himself with God. They stand for so much life as the angel fails to appropriate, in consequence of his defective natural organization. Naturally, or in se, every man of woman born (and angels boast no sweeter birth than this) is inveterately prone to evil ; hence unless he were divinely extricated from his native tendencies, he would never become an angel. This extrication is accomplished by means of the separation of hell from heaven. Hence I repeat that the hells, as Swedenborg pronounces them, are in every variety excrementitious ; they are the waste, the sloughing-off of the human mind in the progress of its conjunction with God.

Take an illustration from nature. The law of health for the natural body is, that there should be a fixed ratio between its supply and its waste, that there should be as nearly as possible an exact balance between the two processes of nutrition and consumption. We daily perform a certain amount of alimentation or physical regeneration ; and in order that our human force should not be swallowed up of mere vegetation, it is necessary that we undergo a proportionate amount of physical decay or degeneration. Now this physical law is only the symbol or image of a great spiritual truth, is merely the ultimate expression, or fixation, of what is transacting in the higher region of the soul. Because on the one hand man is absolutely void of life in himself, his life being in truth incessantly derived to him from God ; and because on the other hand he feels that he is life in himself, or underived life ; it is evident either that he must remain eternally disjoined with God by pride, and all the other evils engendered from it ; or else that some adjustment be operated between his feeling and the absolute truth of things. Now this adjustment, which we are all familiar with under the name of regeneration, necessarily involves in man a certain outflow of merely natural pride and turbulence, in other words, a certain decease to his merely natural self ; and a proportionate inflow of Divine love and tranquillity, in other words, a certain resuscitation to life in God. I say "necessarily involves," because if the feeling which man has of his own independence or absoluteness, should govern his reason, or remain uncontrolled by any interior light of truth, he would obviously never rise out of the animal into the human form of life.

Now the spiritual law which I have just recounted is a universal law; it is a law which is inherent in the constitution of creation, and as creation is not diverse, but strictly uni-versal, so the law I have mentioned is a universal law. Accordingly when we regard the spiritual universe, which is the universe of the human mind, we shall find it discriminated into two opposing spheres, one celestial, answering to the influent Divine life in the universal soul of man, the other infernal, answering to the outflowing natural life. In other words, every man is internally either angel or devil, and this by the irreversible necessity of creation, so that if we discard the truth of the Divine natural humanity, or cling to the perpetual regime of the Divine celestial principle merely, hell is seen to be as fixed a feature of the spiritual world as heaven itself, every angel existing, as Swedenborg shews, only by virtue of some diabolic antipodes.

But my letter is growing too long, and I must hasten to a close.

From all that has gone before, we see very plainly that the angel is only a purified or regenerate natural man, and by no means the fully glorified or Divine natural man, and we need not wonder, therefore, that the heaven of heavens should be unclean in the Divine sight. Indeed, if the Divine Wisdom could effect nothing beyond the angelic form in creation, the time must assuredly come when the devil would reign supreme in the universe, for self-love is an infinitely more potent principle of action than benevolence. But the Lord, or Divine natural man, was always the vital secret of creation, was always the true power of God and the true wisdom of God, the Word of God, by whom all things both in heaven and earth were made, and without whom was not any thing made that has been made. In him is life, and this life is the only true light of men—the light which lighteth every man that comes into the world.

Yours truly,

LETTER V.

Paris, Oct. 10th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

ALL the literal incidents of the birth, life, death, and resurrection of Christ are an eternal REVELATION of the Divine ways to man. These literal incidents all involve the elements of time, space, and person, or fall within the realm of nature; and hence they do not themselves constitute the substantial verity of the spiritual creation, but only the perfect natural image, form, or manifestation of that verity. The substantial verity of the spiritual creation is, that God alone is life, and that He gives life to man. But this being a spiritual truth, can only be discerned by the reason of man, and not by his senses, under penalty of defeating the entire possibility of creation. Did we sensibly perceive God to be the sole life of the universe: were this truth no less a dictate of feeling than of reason, we should be most unhappy. For as in that case we should not feel life to be in ourselves, of course we should fail to appropriate it, or make it our own, and consequently should fail to realise that selfhood, or proprium, which is the condition of all our bliss, because it is the source of all the characteristic activity that separates man from the brute. We should sit like stocks and stones, leaving Him who obviously was life, to the exclusive appropriation and enjoyment of it. But happily sense or feeling is at variance with reason in this matter, telling us with the force of an unsuspected instinct that life lies wholly in ourselves; and hence it leaves the real and benignant truth of the case to the exclusive discernment of reason.

Now reason is dependent for its illumination upon experience, and consequently it cannot discern that God alone is life and the Giver of life to man, save in so far as it becomes experimentally instructed on that point. The reason does not live by abstract truths, but real ones. There is no such thing in God's universe as an abstraction: it is a universe exclusively of realities. It is not true abstractly, or apart from fact, that God is life and gives life to man; but really true, or true to fact, true, that is, to the experience of the creature; and so far as it is untrue to that experience, it is manifestly not true at all. Man's rational development demands, then, a theatre of experience, by means of which he may become built up and established in the truth. For the truth being that God alone is life and the Giver of life to man, it is evident that human reason must strictly ignore it, until it become experimentally demonstrated. I say so much is evident, because no one attributes to man the faculty of intuition, which is the power of growing wise without experience. Had we this power, then indeed we might know the divinest truths without the preliminary discipline of experience. But to say nothing of the utter worthlessness of such knowledge to us, were it actually possible, it is abundantly certain that our reason includes no such faculty: and this being the case, I repeat that reason must obviously remain blind to the great spiritual truth that God alone is Life, and the universal Giver of life, until such time as it shall have become experimentally taught that man is without life in himself, and consequently dependent upon God for it.

This distinctively experimental realm, this needful preliminary sphere of human experience, is the world of Nature. The natural world is not the real world any more than my body, or apparent self, is my real self: it is only the seminary or seed-place of that world, just as my body is only the seminary or seed-place of my soul. The natural world bears to the spiritual or real world precisely the same relation which the body bears to the soul, the shell to the kernel, the effect to the cause, namely: the relation of an image to its projecting substance. As the body is but an image of its spiritual substance, the soul: as the shell is but an image of its material substance, the kernel: as the effect is but an image of its logical substance, the cause: so the natural world, or world of sense, is nothing more than an image, form, or reflection of the spiritual world. It always remains the world of form or imagery, in contradistinction to the world of substance, which, being made up exclusively of affection and of thought derived from that affection, is of necessity spiritual and invisible. Nature is, in short, but the stupendous mirror of superior or spiritual modes of being, and it is therefore idle to demand of her any authoritative or final Divine information. Her function is most rigidly propædeutical or disciplinary, and it would be quite as absurd to expect any original Divine information from her, as it would be to expect the Edinburgh Encyclopædia to give you wit, or your looking-glass to give you beauty. Books pre-suppose wit in the reader, as the looking-glass pre-supposes all the beauty it reflects. JUST SO THE NATURAL WORLD, which is the world of appearances or phenomena, PRE-SUPPOSES THE SPIRITUAL WORLD, which is that of substance or reality, AND IS UTTERLY UNINTELLIGIBLE WITHOUT SOME LIGHT OR "REVELATION" THENCE DERIVED.

Let us clearly understand, then, that the natural world, or world of sense, is never, and in the nature of things cannot be, that ineffable real world which pertains to the soul alone, and whose fundamental truth is that God is Life and the universal Giver of life. Let us distinctly remember, on the contrary, that it is a purely ancillary world to that; that it is in the strictest truth only the handmaid or lieutenant of that better world. The natural world is but a preparatory gymnastic for the soul, a purely experimental realm of life, a marvellous laboratory, at best, in which man becomes acquainted first with what he is in himself, in order that he may worthily estimate what he shall become by the Divine conjunction. This is the exact way it serves the superior or real world, by breeding in us the experimental conviction that we are absolutely devoid of life in ourselves, in spite of every fallacious appearance to the contrary, and hence disposing us to the grateful reception of life from God.

Yours truly,

LETTER VI.

Paris, Oct. 20th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.,

I SAID in my last that the natural world, being the world merely of phenomena or appearance, is strictly unintelligible without some light or revelation derived from the spiritual and real world. The reason of this is not very far to seek. Every lover of Truth, every one who is able to discriminate between Truth and fact, will not merely admit, but will loyally insist that her infinite and spotless form transcends the sphere of sense, or discloses itself only to the eye of reason. All spiritual existence indeed, all those higher truths which affect the soul's life, truths of the Divine existence and operation, of the Divine Creation and Providence, exceed the capacity of sense, and report themselves only to a higher and interior consciousness. To suppose me, for example, sensibly cognizant of an exclusively Divine operation such as my creation is: to suppose me not merely believing that God is my life, or rationally assenting to that truth, but also actually knowing it, or sensibly perceiving it, is virtually to make my faculty of knowledge antedate my being. It is to suppose me essentially on a level with my Creator, or intuitively cognizant of His proceedings: than which of course nothing can be more contradictory. Man therefore can never be sensibly, but only rationally, cognizant of his creation. In fact, as we have already seen, his senses, so far as their testimony goes, must rigidly avouch his absoluteness under penalty of utterly vacating his personality. For if we really felt, i. e. sensibly discerned, God alone to be life, and thus felt, or sensibly discerned our intimate and incessant dependence upon Him for it, we should fail, as I said before, to appropriate or make it our own, and hence should forfeit all that selfhood or personality which is now contingent upon such appropriation.

If now these things be so: if we have no sensible knowledge of spiritual existence: if from the very necessity of the case, our senses give us no authentic information either as to our origin or our destiny: then clearly all our rational convictions upon the subject must be strictly contingent upon some supernatural illumination, upon what men have called REVELATION, in order to distinguish it from mere information. Revelation is commonly conceived of as if it were only information of a higher grade. (Thus Swedenborg is sometimes spoken of by his putative followers as having made a "revelation" of spiritual laws to us; and the American spūks and table-turners are said by some of their disciples to make revelations even in advance of his. But this is an absurd use of the word. What is meant to be said in either case is, that the persons in question give us information of a certain character, and the character being unusual, it is supposed to be entitled on that account to the more dignified name of revelation. But revelation is not a more elevated information, because, strictly speaking, it is not information at all. Information always means imported knowledge, knowledge which is not involved in our consciousness, but which comes up to the soul from the senses, or is derived ab extra. Revelation, on the contrary, means exported knowledge, knowledge which belongs wholly to the sphere of consciousness, or comes down to the senses from the soul, thus ab intra. Whatsoever the broad face of Nature, or the testimony of friends, or the lettered page, brings to our eyes, and ears, and other senses, is information. It always bears the stamp of direct or immediate knowledge, being addressed by the sense to the reason or soul; whereas revelation is always reflected or mediate knowledge, being addressed through the consciousness to the sense as to a mirror. Information postulates Nature as absolute or fixed. Revelation, on the other hand, turns it into a fluent mirror of superior existence. Information is subjective knowledge; that is to say, it embraces whatsoever lies below myself, whatsoever is contained in the sphere of sense, and excluded from that of consciousness. Revelation, on the other hand, is objective knowledge: that is to say, it embraces all that is above myself, whatsoever is included in the sphere of consciousness, and excluded from that of sense. My senses tell me what is below myself: and this is the realm of information. My consciousness tells me what is above myself: and this is the realm exclusively of all Divine revelation. That I can only discern my proper face as it is reflected in a looking-glass is a most strict effect from a spiritual cause; that is, it is a strict correspondence or symbol of the spiritual truth that the soul or selfhood is incessantly derived to us from God, and hence is capable not of an absolute or sensible realization, but only of a conscious one.

It is indeed manifest from all that has gone before, that only this revealed or mirrored knowledge of spiritual substance is possible to us. God, or perfect Love and perfect Wisdom, is the sole and universal spiritual substance; is what alone gives being and gives form to all things; in other words, is sole Creator and Maker of the universe. But we cannot know God intuitively, for in that case we should require to be God: we can only know Him experimentally, that is in so far as we become subjectively conscious of being animated by perfect Love and perfect Wisdom:

or in Swedenborg's formula, in so far as we become "SUBJECTS in which His Divine may be as in Himself, consequently in which it may dwell and remain." In short, we know God only through the Christ, only through the Divine becoming Immanuel, God-with-us, partaker and glorifier of our nature, glorifying it to its actual flesh and bones, and hence as solicitous to give us bodily health and blessing, as health and blessing of soul.

Clearly, then, it would not be one whit less contradictory to postulate for us direct or intuitive knowledge of spiritual substance, than it would be to postulate an acquaintance with our own persons, independently of the looking-glass. In the very nature of things, all our knowledge of the spiritual world must be reflected, or symbolic knowledge must come to us precisely in the way that the knowledge of our own face comes to us, that is, through the mirror WHICH NATURE HERSELF IS, and which therefore she indefatigably holds out to us. Of course, so long as we foolishly hold nature to be destitute of this higher significance: so long as we hold the natural world to be essentially magisterial instead of ministerial; to be, not the mere mirror of the real and substantial world, but that real and substantial world itself: we shall remain utterly devoid of spiritual insight, and continue to be the righteous prey of the dull and lurid despotisms which, under the names of Church and State, drink up God's bounteous life in the soul of man, and turn what should be His blossoming and fruitful earth, into desolations fit only for the owl, and the fox, and the bittern to inhabit.

Yours truly,

_____.

LETTER VII.

Paris, Nov. 1st, 1856.

MY DEAR W.,

You know it is essential to the perfection of a mirror that it should be achromatic or colorless, in other words, that it should not illuminate the object projected on it. If the mirror possess any active qualities, any character or significance apart from the function it performs, it will not be sufficiently passive to the impression made upon it; it will of necessity add something to, or take something from, the image sought to be impressed on it. If it possess substantive life or character,—a life or character of its own, and independent of its properties as a mirror, it will of course reflect the image only in so far as the image is congruous with itself; that is, it will not reflect but absorb the image we seek to impress on it. And its value consequently as a mirror will be destroyed. Thus a mirror in order to be perfect must be merely a mirror, deriving all its force or character from the function it fulfils, and having no significance independently of that function. If it have any independent significance, any light or life of its own, and apart from its function, it will of course color the image impressed on it, and so far forth vitiate it. A mirror therefore, I repeat, should be as near as possible perfectly achromatic or colorless, imparting no illumination to the image impressed on it, but simply reflecting it as it stands illumined by some superior light.

Now, as we have seen, Nature is the perfect mirror of the Divine image in creation. But inasmuch as every true mirror is achromatic, or incapable of illuminating the image it reflects, we do not ask of Nature to supply the light also by means of which the Divine image becomes revealed in her. If we do this; if we allow Nature to dominate the image impressed on her; to color it by her own light; we shall utterly fail of any valid result. A light above nature must evoke the desired image—a light which is not only unaffected by Nature's perturbations and diffractions, but actually reduces them by its stedfast and commanding glow to a perfect order or unity. This light is REVELATION. Revelation is the lamp which darkens the light of sun, moon, and stars, or turns them into the obedient vassals of the soul, by shewing them to be merely a passive mirror of the Divine image in humanity. But here let us always remember that revelation, like man whom it serves, and whom it could not otherwise serve, claims both a body and a soul, both a letter and a spirit. Its letter is fixed or finite: its spirit is eternal and infinite, that is, is utterly devoid of relation either to time or space. In its literal or bodily form, Revelation serves only to dislodge the mind from Nature's bondage, to break the shackles of routine and tradition, and so prepare a ground for its spiritual advent and recognition. It is a seed—an egg—which being deposited in the earth of the natural mind will become at length divinely quickened, and bring forth fruit of a ravishing spiritual savour. In short, viewed literally, Revelation has no end but to call out or edify a typical church, to separate a purely formal nation to God, or to write His yet unimagined name and quality on a certain representative people, in such large ceremonial characters as shall vividly image to the cultivated sense, to the eye of reason, the great spiritual truth of creation, and so give eternal anchorage or embodiment to whatsoever the heart conceives of good and the intellect of true in the relation of universal man to God. For in its spiritual or substantial scope, Revelation means neither more nor less than the life of God in the universal soul of man, and hence is adequately appreciable only to the most advanced scientific culture, only to the perfected reason, of the race.

Let us then be conscientiously careful, my friend, not to suffer the letter of Revelation to dominate its spirit. Revelation is indeed a light to illuminate the Divine image impressed upon the natural creation, but then as every light supposes an eye to which alone it is addressed, we must be extremely careful not to darken her lustre by applying to it the merely natural eye—the eye of sense. Revelation is addressed only to the spiritual eye, the eye of culture, to the scientific reason of man, and we utterly defeat it therefore if we attempt to comprehend or interpret it naturally. Science alone—the most advanced science, the science of those spiritual laws which lie behind nature, and pronounce her a realm of mere appearances or phenomena—authenticates Revelation. That is to say, science in this enlarged form corrects our sensible impressions of nature, corrects those purely sensuous judgments of the mind which break Nature up into endless discords and diversities, and thus moulds her into perfect order or harmony. And when we shall see Nature's order and harmony, we shall assuredly see her reflecting in every glorified lineament and feature, the LORD, or that Divine NATURAL man who is the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the Ending of creation, who is, and who was, and who is to come, the All-powerful.

Exactly here in fact lies the imbecility of all our existing theologies and philosophies. The reason why they all fail to discern the Divine image stamped upon Nature, is, that they are not purely rational or scientific, but are all more or less blinded by the light of Nature. Instead of viewing Nature simply as a mirror of the Divine creation, and therefore seeking the image she reflects by means of a light wholly superior to, and indeed exhaustive of, her own, our fashionable theologians and philosophers take her for the veritable creation itself, and listen to her muddled oracles as though they were the indisputable wisdom of God. The fact is, that our leading authorities in Church and State have not even begun as yet to extricate us from Nature's initial fallacy or blunder, which is her affirmation of the absoluteness of the selfhood in man. Nature tells me by means of my senses, that I am what I am absolutely, that is, without reference to other existence: it says that all my good and truth, all my affection and thought, originate in myself, and consequently when either good or evil preponderates in that affection and thought, it bids me appropriate the merit or demerit thereof to my self; thus making me at one moment the victim of the most baneful moral elation, and the next of an almost equally baneful moral depression. Self-conceit and self-reproach, pride and penitence; these make up the fever and the chill into which that great intermittent, which we call our religious experience, ordinarily resolves itself. In short, Nature taking advantage of the selfhood (which is God's ceaseless communication to me, which constitutes, in fact, His inalienable presence in me, the true Shekinah or holy of holies), to affirm my absoluteness or sunder my solidarity with all my kind, drives me to an eager eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, so shutting me up to an alternate moral inflation and collapse, and in both cases alike disqualifying me to eat of the tree of Life.

The service which Swedenborg has done the rational or scientific mind, by the light he has cast upon this great truth of human solidarity, is incalculable. He proves to us by a faithful exposition of spiritual laws, which are the laws of creation, that no individual is independent of any other, and that there is consequently no such thing as individual approbation or individual condemnation, in the Divine mind. He shews us that, since the world has stood, no man has been chargeable before God with either his moral good or evil, because neither the one nor the other originates in the man himself, but are both alike an influence from other beings with whom he is spiritually associated. He shews me that all the good I feel in my affections, and all the truth I realize in my intellect, are an indubitable influence from heaven; and all my evil and falsity a like influence from hell. Both good and evil, truth and falsity, flow in to the natural mind unimpeded, because the natural mind being the common mind of the race, is the sole basis or continent of all its spiritual good and evil, and is indeed vivified solely by giving these things unity. But this being the case, if I proceed thereupon to appropriate to myself this influent natural good, or this influent natural evil : if for example when I have done good to my neighbour, I look up to God with a sense of self-complacency, feeling that He loves me now more than He did before ; and when I have done evil to my neighbour, I look up to God with a sense of ill-desert, feeling that He now loves me less than He did before : I then exclude myself from the tree of Life, the life of the Lord, or the Divine NATURAL humanity, and shut myself up in eternal death which is stupidity—the stupidity that grows out of a cultivated self-satisfaction. From the beginning mankind has known no other curse than this, “eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil ;” and yet it is the curse which all our ecclesiastical and political doctors, backed by all our sentimental and professedly infidel scribes,* are assiduously

* There are no truer friends of the infantile Church and State than Mr. Francis Newman and Mr. Holyoake : and if the Catholic Church were not providentially doomed and done for, or what is the same thing hopelessly besotted as to her own interests by her own selfishness, she would instantly remit John Henry Newman to the back settlements, and exalt Francis and the Secularists into his place. For these men are the real ames damnées of Moralism, heartily despising and deriding Christ for every utterance and every act which expressed a Diviner life in him (and if in him actually, so of course by implication potentially in all men his brethren), than the mere life of conscience or will. And this is the precise temper busy in fastening upon us. One can hardly exaggerate the zeal they display in this disreputable calling; but one can easily anticipate the fierceness of the reaction which, under the providential illumination of the scientific conscience, they are preparing for themselves; and which will leave no vestige of their futile labours surviving.

Yours truly,

of mind which vivifies our present ecclesiastical and political corruption: a disposition to aggrandise and intensify the moral life of man, to inflame that sentiment of personal difference and distinction among men, which litters all our existing contrasts of good and evil, rich and poor, wise and simple, proud and grovelling, and so immortalizes the reign of hell on earth. I am perfectly persuaded that Mr. Newman and the Secularists are as unconscious of any desire to oppress mankind as I am, and I do willing justice to the benignity which animates much of their writing: but when the best-intentioned persons persist in prescribing for diseases which they are obstinately content to know nothing about, better instructed people grow tired at length of acknowledging their infatuated good intentions, and reasonably vociferate for some slight increase of understanding as well.

LETTER VIII.

Paris, Nov. 7th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

It is a well-known law of optics that every image of a natural object impressed upon our retina, takes an inverted form. For example, I am looking at a horse passing my window. Now if you could look into my eyes, you would perceive that the image projected from this horse upon their retina, was upside down. Natural philosophers, as they are called (by those who conceive that Nature furnishes philosophy as well as fact) are very much like that incoherent gentleman who tried to lift himself from a lower to an upper story, by tugging at his waistband, and accordingly always insist upon making Nature explain herself, or give an account of her own processes; than which nothing can be more unphilosophical. For Nature is a sphere of effects exclusively, and utterly banishes cause therefore beyond her borders. To ask Nature to give you an insight into creation, or to shed any light upon her own causes, is in reality not a bit less absurd than it would be to ask your coat and pantaloons to give you an insight into humanity, or explicate their own genesis in the moral and meteorological necessities of their wearer. Nevertheless our natural philosophers view things differently, and have long been trying to account on optical principles exclusively, for our seeing things upright, in spite of the invariably inverted form they take upon the retina. They say they find it easy enough to account on natural principles for the inverted form itself; for this is a purely optical fact growing out of the relations of the eye to light, and needs only the knowledge of those relations to explain it. What they call accounting for it in short, is only stating its constitution.

But our seeing things upright in spite of the inverted image they take upon the retina! In fine, the bare fact of SIGHT at all! Ah! this is by no means a mere optical fact, and refuses to be explained upon purely natural principles. It is a fact utterly transcending the realm of optics, and your most ingenious Herschels and Aragos are not a whit better qualified to pronounce upon it than you or I, or any other simply honest person. For sight, considered as active, is a fact of Life exclusively, of life manifesting itself no doubt by an organized medium, but entirely unidentical with such medium. In short, sight is a purely SUBJECTIVE experience, the experience of a living subject, and refuses to become intelligible save by reference to that Supreme Life or Being to which we are all variously but equally subject. To understand the phenomena of sight accordingly, to perceive the reason why, for example, we see all things in nature upright, when their images are reflected upon the retina in an inverted form, we must not merely know the laws of optics, but we must above all things know the laws of Life, life universal and particular. And those laws as we have already seen, demand for their elucidation a light above that of the sun, demand in fact a spiritual Revelation such as Christianity purports to be.

Let me attempt to approach this great theme, then, in a way which will not too violently shock your prejudices, by seeking to explain the phenomena of natural vision, or to shew why we invariably see horses and cattle, houses and trees, upright, when their images are always reflected upon the retina upside down.

The summary explanation of all natural experiences, and this among the rest, is, that Nature is but an experimental world; in other words, that from her lowest pebble up to her perfected form which is the human body, she is but a mirror of the soul, or true creation: and it is never the function of a mirror to reflect that which inwardly or really or consciously is, but only that which outwardly or actually or unconsciously appears. In other words the mirror never reflects being as it exists to itself, or consciously, but only as it exists to others, or phenomenally. Thus it never imparts intelligence or wisdom to us, but only fact or appearance which are the servants of wisdom. If for example I should visit my glass every morning for instruction as well as information, for wisdom as well as knowledge : if I should go there not merely to ask how I appear to others than myself, but also to ask how I really exist to myself: I should instantly find every dictate of my consciousness belied. I should be sure to put the patch which belonged to my right cheek upon the left, and give my left whisker the trimming which every interest of equilibrium demanded only for the right. For the mirror invariably tells me that my right hand is my left, and my left hand my right, so that if I were to obey its instruction for the real truth of the case, instead of depending exclusively upon my own natural consciousness, I should soon exhibit as insane a picture personally, or with reference to the interests of my body, as he does spiritually or with reference to the interests of the soul, who follows the teaching of Nature in that regard, without reference to the commanding light of Revelation. In short our mirrors never disclose the veritable being of things, but only the form or appearance which that being puts on to other eyes than its own. They do not give us the perfect Truth itself, but only the mask, the appearance, the semblance which that truth wears to an imperfect or finite intelligence, as to the bodily eye for example : and we seize the essential or rational Truth in every case, by exactly reversing this mirrored or reflected semblance of it.

Now nature being a mirror of the soul or spiritual creation, and nothing but a mirror, we must of course insist upon her renouncing all higher pretensions, and observing strictly every exigency of her own character. That is to say she must reflect the soul or spiritual world, not as it is in itself or really, not as it exists to its own consciousness, but only as it is phenomenally, or as it exists to a more limited intelligence than itself, say the bodily eye. In other words, we must expect to see the natural consciousness exactly reversing the spiritual one. Thus what the spiritual affection pronounces good, the natural affection must pronounce evil : what to the spiritual understanding is truth must be to the natural falsity : what is light to the spiritual eye must be darkness to the natural eye : what to the former is right must be left to the latter : what is head to the one must be heels to the other : and so forth. By natural light therefore, the light which the mirror herself supplies, it is no wonder that all things within her framework appear upright and orderly and beautiful ; just as in the looking glass that which is really or consciously my left hand is made to appear my right : whilst in reality or to the spiritual consciousness, they are the exact reverse of upright and orderly and beautiful, as we see by the inverted forms they assume when they are reflected towards the soul, whose nearest outpost is the retina, and other apparatus constituting the needful basis of the varied life of sense.

It is accordingly not at all remarkable that we see things upright, whose image upon the retina is inverted, because natural light, by which we see the things in question, is in itself but an inversion or correspondence, and by no means an extension, of spiritual light. Those who make a marvel of this experience, undoubtedly hold that we see the image of the natural object on the retina, instead of the natural object itself. But this is simply absurd or contradictory. It would indeed be truly marvellous, if while actually seeing this inverted image we yet saw the object upright. But this is impossible. In that case it would not be the eye which sees, but the brain. For we see not what lies within the eye, but what lies without it: and the image in question falls not upon the eye, but exclusively upon the brain through its extension into the retina.

But some one will ask, Do we not see at least by means of this inverted image? Do we not see by virtue of a reflection of the natural world on the retina? This question puts the cart before the horse, but I can manage to satisfy it. It is a universal truth that the natural world is altogether vivified from the spiritual one, and it is also true that this vivification takes place through certain media, which we call the senses. Thus we see, we hear, we smell, we taste, we touch, which are all experiences of natural life, by virtue of a spiritual influx into the retina, the tympanum, the olfactory and gustatory nerves, and the skin. But this influx does not traverse these various media, or pass through them: on the contrary, it is always arrested there by the exact contrariety or inversion which it encounters at the hands of Nature; and it is this very arrestation which becomes the basis of our natural subjectivity, or makes our natural experience possible. Thus the inverted natural image on the retina is nothing more nor less than a reverberation or contre-coup made upon the spiritual sense by an act of natural vision: it marks the arrest and reflection, or bending back, of the spiritual world upon itself, when it would otherwise pass out of its sphere, and dominate the natural one. It is therefore true to say that we see by means of this reflex natural image on the retina, thus far, namely:—that if that reflex image did not take place, it would be because there was no difference between soul and body, between spirit and nature, and consequently because we were not intended to enjoy any natural life. Beyond this, it is absurdly untrue.

I said just now that it was this arrestation of the soul, or of spiritual influx, at the portals of sense, which alone allowed us a natural subjectivity. This is obvious enough. For if the soul passed through these nervous media, so subjecting the natural body to itself: if in other words the spiritual consciousness dominated the bodily or natural consciousness, passing into it not courteously and by correspondence, but brutally or in person: why then of course we should have no natural sight or natural consciousness of any sort. We should in that case be the mere slaves and packhorses of the soul, and would soon lose even the bodily form appropriate to humanity: for that erect form postulates an indwelling divinity or freedom even down to its toe-nails. In a word natural experience is never, but in most diseased and beastly conditions, the continuation or reproduction of spiritual experience: it is most strictly, or at its healthiest, a correspondence and inversion of it, just as the inside of a glove is a correspondence and inversion of its outside. We see naturally only by ceasing to see spiritually; and we cease to see spiritually by the very necessity of our natural organization, which makes the eye, the ear, and every other sense a common medium for the soul instead of an individual one. Spiritual sight demands an organ which is empowered only from within the subject, which derives its potency entirely from the affection and thought, or spiritual character, of such subject. Hence Swedenborg continually saw persons whose interiors were of that human largeness that they sensibly communicated with the remotest planets, turning the distance between the earth and Orion into a childish superstition, into a mere scientific pedantry. But natural sight demands an organ most strictly irrespective of the individual character of the subject, because depending exclusively upon his relations to the race, or what he has in common with all other men. Thus the angel Gabriel if he were in the flesh, could make no morning call in Andromeda, whatever might be his inward fitness, and would be obliged to drop his dearest friend in Arcturus, simply because his natural organization is not the continuance or extension of his spiritual one, but its decisive contrast and contradiction, invariably pronouncing that first which the latter pronounces last, and declaring that the highest good and truth and beauty, which the latter declares to be the lowest evil and falsity and deformity.

But I must come a little closer to my subject, and by way of relieving your fixed attention, I will postpone what more I have to say to another letter. Don't grow discouraged; the goal is clearly before us, with heaven's own radiance encircling it, and it will not be long before we grow perfectly familiar with the approaches to it.

Yours truly,

LETTER IX.

Paris, Nov. 20th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

YOU know how continually Swedenborg protests against the popular habit of regarding space and time as real existences, and how he denies that any right understanding can be had of creation so long as that habit remains undisturbed. "Do not, he says, I beseech you, confound your ideas with time and space, for in proportion as you do so, you will really understand no Divine work. Creation cannot be explained in an intelligible manner, unless time and space be removed from the thought, but if these are removed it may be so explained. It is manifest from the ideas of the angels which are without space, that in the created universe nothing lives but God-man alone, or the Lord, and that nothing moves but by life from Him: thus that in Him we live, move, and are."—Divine Love and Wisdom, 51, 155, 285-6, 300-1.

Now what does Swedenborg mean by thus everlastingly warning us against taking our sensible judgments of time and space as absolute, or confirming them from the reason? He means, in other words, to say that theologians and philosophers have an inveterate habit of representing life as a commerce or play between an internal subject and an external object, and so of degrading or brutifying life. For as in every logical copulation of object and subject, the object is the controlling member of the copula, and the subject the obedient one, so of course I cannot be subject to the external universe without being, in the exact ratio of the reach of my subjection, brutalized, or deprived of my human quality. The human essence lies in finding its object on a higher or interior plane to that of its own subjectivity, in short, in interiorating the object to the subject. Consequently when philosophy or theology reverses this process and shews me to myself as a legitimate subject of nature, it degrades me to the brute, or dehumanizes me. We may say then in strictly scientific speech, that the vice, according to Swedenborg, of all our orthodox modes of thought, lies in their sensuality, that is, in their systematic exterioration of the object to the subject, of the not-me to the me.

Take for example any fact of life, which philosophers call, a sensible perception. I see a horse. "Now" say the philosophers, "there are obviously two things involved in this experience, a subject and an object, a me and a not-me. I am the seeing subject, the horse is the seen-object. I consequently as subject am included in my body ; the horse, as object, is excluded from that body, and hence is external to me. And so of all other facts of life. Thus the object, or not-me, is in every case spatially exterior to the subject, or me."

"Halt there!" cries Swedenborg, and I am now giving you the sheer pith of all his doctrine on this subject ; "this is a most childish analysis of the experience in question, and will not bear the least scrutiny. I see a horse. There are two visible bodies enumerated in this proposition no doubt, my body and that of the horse, separated by more or less of space, and distinguishable from each other by almost every sense. But remember, we are talking, not of any logical proposition with its copula of object and subject, nor yet of any fact of sense, but wholly of a fact of life or consciousness, namely, sight: and the question is whether this fact of life or consciousness does not, within its own limits, completely annul the distance which to the eye separates all natural objects, and fuse them in living unity? We know perfectly well, already, that to the senses, or apparently, all things exist under the forms of space and time, that is, in spatial and temporal separation from each other. What alone we seek to know, accordingly, is whether they exist so really as well as apparently ; that is to say, whether the consciousness does not lift them out of the isolation they exhibit to the sense, and fuse them in the unity or universality of the me ?

“ For example : take any experience of life, say some fact of vision, as when I see a horse, a tree, a sunset, or any thing else in Nature : now to all the extent of this experience I am merely realizing a fact of consciousness or of relation : I am not exerting any sensible power, or putting forth any latent faculty stored away in my visual organ independently of the surrounding universe. Sight is never in the eye alone, or apart from the things seen. It is only in the eye as livingly associated or fused with the universe of creation, with all that the sun shines upon. Take away the horse, and the tree, and the sunset, with whatsoever may stand in their place, and you take away my sight. Though I had all the eyes of Briareus, I should be more blind than a bat : I should not see at all. For I have no absolute power of sight or hearing, or smell, or taste, or touch ; that is to say, in myself considered as unrelated to, or dis-united with, the universe of light and sound, etc., I have no power of any sort, I am even destitute of consciousness, and do not exist : but in myself considered as related to or one with all these universes, I am full of power. Thus the eye is vivified, not apart from, but only in conjunction with, the universe of light ; and so of all our other experiences, they are none of them simple facts, but all are composite ones, involving our intensest unity with Nature, or the universality of the me. They are all facts of con-sciousness : that is, they all imply, that though in reflection or when I listen to my senses simply, I know myself as limited to this wretched body, yet in life or consciousness, when I am acting and not merely thinking of myself, I know myself only as one with the sensible universe, as lovingly blent or associated with all that my senses contain and embrace.

“It is evident from all this that I do not exist consciously as an independent being, but only as a most dependent one, that is, as an individual form involving strictly universal relations. I exist only to consciousness, only in so far as I feel myself in universal relations; and I LIVE, that is to say, my existence becomes beautiful and delicious to me, just in so far as these relations are relations of complete accord, furtherance, and obedience. When the eye does not spontaneously melt into its own universe, or the realm of light, but shrinks into its bodily enclosure, it is diseased and ready to die. When the ear does not spontaneously command its own universe, or the realm of sound, but recoils upon itself, it no longer lives but is preparing to die, and is only kept alive in fact by the influx of life into the healthier organs. And so of all our senses, the moment they cease to universalize the soul or me, the moment they begin to shut us up to our bodily dimensions, they are diseased and prove a curse instead of a blessing, an avenue of conscious death in place of conscious life.

“Understand then that the soul, the me, the selfhood is a purely conscious existence, unrecognizable by sense. No doubt my body exists to your eye, quite absolutely and independently of all other bodies; and no doubt that foolish eye may identify my body with my self or me. But this is a pure fallacy of sense. To the senses I exist only animally, or as a natural body, subject to all the laws of nature, and in this gross, sensual, and culinary form I first come to consciousness no doubt, and present myself to the acquaintance of your bodily eye. But I exist humanly and really only to your interior senses, only to those subtler senses which belong to your spirit, and which recognize me under exclusively spiritual forms, since they pronounce me now good and now evil, now noble and now mean, now wise and now silly, now amiable and now detestable; which are all qualities of spirit and not of matter. In fine then, the me, truly viewed, is altogether a conscious existence, or knows itself only in inseparable unity with the universe; and by restricting it to bodily dimensions, or subjecting it to the laws of space and time, you degrade and stifle it quite as much as you degrade and stifle my body when you incarcerate it within dead walls, and seclude it from the genial light and warmth by which alone it lives. Life, consciousness, always implies association, always implies the fellowship, union, or fusion of two sensibly distinct or disunited forms, the specific and general, the unitary and universal; just as water implies the fusion or unity of oxygen and hydrogen for its own production. To the spiritual intelligence accordingly, it would be no less absurd to separate the unitary element in consciousness from the universal one, and call the gasping thing life, than it would be to the scientific understanding to expel hydrogen from oxygen, and call the crazy and viewless remainder water. Water is the perfect fusion or union of oxygen and hydrogen, just as the living me, the conscious individuality, is the perfect fusion or union of the unitary and universal life. No doubt that oxygen and hydrogen in order to form water, combine in invariably definite proportions; but this is only saying in analogous terms, that the fusion or union which the individual consciousness operates between the specific and the general, between the unitary and the universal forms, is most strictly a marriage-fusion or union: that is to say, that the former or liminary element in consciousness is always feminine, and the latter or universal element is always masculine, and that the secret of human destiny lies in allowing the former element the free preponderance of the latter.

Thus, in effect, Swedenborg explodes the popular conception of consciousness, and shews it utterly unworthy of the reality. For consciousness disavows the antagonism asserted by sense between the various forms of Nature, and proves them indissolubly fused and blent in the unity and universality of the me. In short, consciousness claims the totality of the sensible universe as the indispensable realm of the me, and consequently finds no faintest glimmer of the not-me within it. When I listen to sense, which has a very subtle and insinuating voice, I hear precisely what the philosophers hear: I hear that the distinctively human force in me, the soul, the self, the me, is subject to the natural force, is subject to my bodily limitations, or the laws of space and time: thus that I stand in the fixed relation of subject to the cat and the dog, the cockroach and the louse, and all other forms of universal life; and all these forms again in the fixed relation of object to me. But when I grow indignant with this sensual stuff, and listen to the voice of consciousness instead—to the voice of the soul, the reason or true me—I hear an exactly opposite doctrine. For the spiritual reason or consciousness tells me whenever I consult it, not that I am subject to the natural universe, but that the natural universe is properly subject to me, is in fact merely the contents of my spiritual subjectivity. It brings the natural universe, by means of the senses, within the periphery of the me, within the realm of conscious life: and consequently it utterly eliminates the not-me from the finite sphere, binding me to seek it instead in that of spiritual substance, the sphere of infinite Love and Wisdom. In other words, it identifies the not-me exclusively with God, thus denying me, as subject, any proportionate or befitting object, short of the immaculate Divine perfection. And in so doing, it manifestly stifles Atheism on the one hand, by proving God the sole life of the universe; while on the other hand, it sops up Atheism's younger and feebler brother, Pantheism, in yet separating God from that universe by all the breadth of our spiritual consciousness, by all the amplitude of the finite me.

If you are desirous after a fuller investigation of the constitution of consciousness, I refer you to an article in Putnam's Monthly (New York, November 1853), entitled Works of Sir William Hamilton. An earnest attempt is there made to expose the vulnerable body of our orthodox philosophy, with what success I must leave you to determine. At present I hear you inquiring, what, after all, Swedenborg's rectification of our intellectual methods avails to the right understanding of creation, or to a scientific cosmology; and this question I at once proceed to answer.

I may answer it briefly by saying, that it avails thus much: without that rectification creation is inconceivable, is in fact a dense absurdity; and the old church is simply right in betaking herself, as we see her doing, in the person of all her actually living children, of all those whose intellectual life is not swallowed up in mere routine and formalism, to the embraces either of Atheism or Pantheism. The hardier and intellectual sort among them will prefer the former terminus as effectually ending the journey, and giving the soul a long quietus. The tenderer and affectionate sort will prefer Pantheism, as still keeping up some faint semblance of progress, although that progress be decidedly inhuman, or from the solid back into the liquid, and even the gaseous state. But both sorts alike are the legitimate children of the orthodox church, and do but illustrate the logical dilemma into which her prevalent Naturalism forces all her honest and clear-sighted descendants. Nothing short of this explains the church's hatred of them, and her eager disavowal of intellectual complicity. She evidently feels herself endangered by their inability to keep counsel, and hates them accordingly very much as the convicted culprit hates the treacherous approver.

But you do not desire so brief an answer as this, and I had therefore better commit what I have to say to another letter.

Yours truly,

LETTER X.

Paris, Nov. 29th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

I AM now going to discourse to you a little while about the two following propositions: first, that creation is strictly unintelligible on the orthodox hypothesis of personality; and, second, that it becomes strictly intelligible when you substitute an improved or scientific conception of that subject.

The orthodox hypothesis of spiritual existence, or of the me, imports that I am quite as absolute or finite with respect to my soul, as I am with respect to my body. It supposes that spiritual existence is equally absolute with physical, and consequently has as little dread of the conscience pronouncing me good or evil, amiable or hateful, and so limiting my spiritual personality, as it has of the senses pronouncing me blond or brown, handsome or ugly, so defining my natural personality. It accepts without any misgiving the insurgent dictation of the senses in this particular, and looks upon the selfhood, or personal element in me, as spiritually claiming the same rigid fixity, the same absolute dimensions as my body. For example, I steal, commit adultery, or murder. Conscience tells me that these are evil and abominable deeds : and my self-consciousness, instructed by the current theology and philosophy, appropriates this evil to myself, or pronounces me an evil man, justly abominable to God and all good men. There are others, who unlike me, refrain from all these misdeeds, who in all their domestic and civic relations strive to fulfil the golden rule, and do as they would be done by. Their self-consciousness, again instructed by the orthodox philosophy of the selfhood, affirming its essential absoluteness, appropriates this good to them, or pronounces them good men, entitled to expect the blessing of heaven upon themselves and their posterity.

Manifestly, then, the orthodox notion stultifies itself. For it presents us two distinctly opposite beings claiming the creatureship of one and the same infinite power. It presents us two beings as vividly contrasted as evening and morning, only, unlike evening and morning, which both alike but in successive order melt into perfect day, these contrasted beings declare themselves absolute or unrelated, and refuse to merge therefore in any higher and unitary personality.

So sheer a contradiction as orthodoxy here offers us, forces us of course upon one of two conclusions: either 1. that the good and evil man are not the final subjects of God, but only the intermediary and transient form of that subjectivity; in other words, that the moral life is not the true life of God in the soul of man: or 2. that the orthodox philosophy is wrong in her estimate of these men, they being not absolutely good and evil as she affirms, or good and evil with respect to each other, but only phenomenally so, or with reference to the divergent relation they bear to another and higher life. In short, their good or their evil cannot be attributed to themselves individually, and hence does not characterize them in the Divine sight, but must ascribe itself, all that is good in them, to their common creative source, exclusively, and all that is evil in them, exclusively to their common formative nature.

No sane man can deny moral distinctions. The distinction of good and evil, truth and falsity, among men, is as palpable to the soul, or rational experience, as that of heat and cold, light and darkness, is to the bodily experience. The reason indeed is vivified by those differences, so that if you annul them you evaporate reason itself. But it is only the more clear, therefore, that such vital opposites, if you regard them absolutely or in themselves, and as unaffected towards some third and neutral term, cannot acknowledge the same creative source. The philosopher may indeed allege, that he does not mean to say that the evil man was created evil by the Divine hand, but that having been originally created good by that hand, he afterwards became evil of himself. But who but a determined suicide, leaps into the fire in order to save himself from the frying-pan? For to say nothing of the possibility which is here admitted of any good man extant losing his present status, and becoming converted into an evil man, one is immediately prompted to demand where he who was originally created good by the Divine hand, got the power to defeat that creation, and render himself evil? If the answer be, that he was created with that power, then as we can't conceive God giving a power to his creature which He would not have the creature exercise or enjoy, you evidently make God a participant in the downfall of His creature. If the answer be that the power was derived from the Devil, the question immediately recurs, and remains in fact insatiable, who is this Devil that thus masters God, and converts a Divine performance from good into evil?

I repeat, then, that we cannot regard the good and evil man as true creatures of God, save in so far as we cease to regard them absolutely or in themselves, and view them exclusively as they stand related to a third term, which shall have power to annul or swallow up their intrinsic antagonism and conflict in the breadth of its own majestic unity. In other words, the moral realm cannot be regarded as the realm of the Divine creation, unless you make moral existence to be purely elementary and subsidiary to an infinitely superior life. If we make moral distinctions absolute: if we make them to attach to men not merely in their own finite estimation, but also in the Divine estimation: if, for example, we say that Mummy the murderer, as compared with any indubitably good man, say Dr. Channing, is and always will be a bad man, not merely to our judgment, but also to God's judgment, so as that God will really love the one man and hate the other, or at all events experience a conflict of emotions in reference to them: it is evident that we instantly destroy the Divine infinitude, or invest Him with a fickle perfection. And if we start from any datum short of God's immutable perfection in constructing our cosmology, it is certain that we must never expect to achieve any satisfactory scientific result. A scientific cosmology is totally inconceivable upon any other postulate than that of the complete dependence and equality of the creature in the creative estimation. It must hold with Swedenborg and the more instructed angels, that all men are precisely alike in the Divine sight, good and evil, wise and silly, strong and weak, rich and poor; and that all their differences arise not from any absolute root, but from their various relation to the Lord or Divine natural man, whose true or spiritual advent is now taking place in all the abounding truths of human fellowship or unity. Swedenborg shews us that the good man, the saint, the angel, the seraph, name him as you will, is in himself or intrinsically of exactly the same pattern with the evil man, the sinner, the devil, the satan; and that all his differential good confesses itself to be of the Divine operation in him, continually subjugating his intrinsic tendencies. I once knew a loquacious person who said: "I can't imagine how any one should have any distrust of God. For my part, if I were once in His presence, I should feel like cuddling-up to Him as instinctively as I would cuddle-up to the sunshine or the fire in a wintry day." It is beautiful to observe how utterly destitute Swedenborg found the angelic mind of all this putrid sentimentality, this abject personal piety. He never met with any angel rich enough to patronize Deity, or to imagine that God felt the least personal affection towards him more than He felt towards the duskiest denizen of hell. In short, he found the angels of an intensely human quality, or saved from lying and theft, adultery and murder, not by feeling themselves or thinking themselves any better than other men, the most infernal; but simply by feeling and thinking themselves intensely one with all other men, even the most infernal. In a word, the ground out of which all angelic manhood springs, is never Pride, or the sentiment of personal difference among men, but always Humility, or the sentiment of their complete spiritual unity.

Let us then abandon the orthodox cosmology as simply incredible, because it makes the me absolute, and thus sows division in God's spiritual universe: because, in other words, it makes the spiritual or real world to consist not of one richly unitary life or soul (which we may name maximus homo, or grand man, in contradistinction to you and me as minimi homines, or least men), but of as many discordant and disunited souls as nature presents of discordant and disunited bodies. This is what the good book calls "eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil," at the instigation of the serpent. The serpent symbolizes the sensual principle, and "eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil," means accordingly a state of understanding in man instructed only by the senses. In the infancy of the natural mind, whether of the race or the individual, we judge only according to the sensuous appearance of things, and not according to their rational reality: in other words, we appropriate to ourselves the good and the evil which are derived to us only from spiritual association, being utterly ignorant that the one is strictly an influence from heaven, and the other an influence from hell. And thus appropriating these things to ourselves, we are inevitably filled with self-complacency or self-loathing, just as the one or the other influence prevails. The eternal Wisdom in its letter says to man: Thou shalt not eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil without the surest experience of death: which being spiritually interpreted, means: "Cease to appropriate to yourself either the good or the evil you know, because neither the one nor the other belongs to you, both alike being intended for no other purpose than by their exact equilibrium to give you selfhood, and so provide a basis for your subsequent immortal conjunction with all Divine perfection. If, therefore, you foolishly appropriate this merely influent good and evil to yourself, you will completely misconceive your destiny: you will so far defeat the Divine benignity towards you. Instead of becoming Divinely stripped of all baggage, of all natural impediment, and so qualified to aspire after all Divine perfection, you will become inflated with pride, feeling yourself as knowing as God; and hence, instead of filially following His ways, and finding peace therein, you will insist upon being your own Providence, and will thus manage, unless the Divine wisdom counteract you, to immerse yourself in endless perplexities and bring up in final despair. In truth, by persisting in this insane career, you will grow so full of inward death, so replete with malignant pride and self-love, that you will compel the Divine love to defeat you of your own selfhood, of your proper nature, and endow you with a new one more surely pliant to His great behests."

Swedenborg, in his amazing pictures of the spiritual universe, so dull and unattractive to the thoughtless mind, but so vivid with every charm of colour to the instructed sense, shews us this actual defecation of the natural selfhood, or proprium, going on in the separation of hell from heaven; and he proves, against all rational cavil, that the eternal and intimate sweetness of the Divine creation is contingent upon such separation. He never for a moment represents these transactions in the realm of man's spiritual experience, as an arbitrary arrangement, or as being their own end. On the contrary, he conclusively proves that they grow out of the very necessities of creation, being rigidly subservient to the permanent redemption of the human mind from the baseness and stupidity it contracts, in listening to the flattering and fallacious dogmatism of sense. And this brings me to my second point, which is to shew how intelligible creation becomes, when you take an improved and rational view of the constitution of the selfhood. But I will treat this point in another letter.

Yours truly,

LETTER XI.

Paris, Dec. 3, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

MY last letter went to prove that creation was strictly unintelligible, so long as you made the soul, or the me, an essentially finite existence like the body; so long as you identified it with the dimensions of time and space, and so separated it from the unity and universality of Love and Wisdom.

I propose in the present letter to give you the converse aspect of that proposition, or to shew how strictly intelligible creation becomes, when you view the soul, or the me, as essentially infinite, or infinite in itself, and finite only by subjection to the individual or natural consciousness, the consciousness instructed by sense. Let us proceed, then, with all possible dispatch.

If, as we have already seen, time and space are not real and substantial existence: if, in truth, they are only the semblance—the appearance—which that existence puts on to a lower range of intelligence, say to the senses: then clearly the soul can avouch itself a real and substantial existence only in so far as it casts off the subjection of time and space. But that which is not subject to space and time is infinite and eternal : and infinite and eternal are two words employed exclusively to designate uncreated being. Thus the soul, in order to avouch itself a real or substantial existence, is bound to be infinite and eternal, is bound to be uncreated.

Viewed spiritually, then, the soul is uncreated, is in simple verity, God. How then does it become what we call created, that is, subject to space and time? For this is what we invariably mean when we call a thing created ; we mean that it is a finite existence, that it is subject to the conditions of space and time. How then does the soul, which is essentially uncreated, being the infinite God, become as it were converted into a creature, become finited in space and time? Swedenborg sheds a flood of light on this inquiry, the most interesting that can engage the mind of man, and makes it intelligible to the plainest capacity. He shews that the soul becomes created, or falls under the dominion of time and space, not really or to its own apprehension, but only apparently, or in accommodation to the exigencies of our selfhood, of our individual consciousness. For example, I have no absolute or underived selfhood, but only a reflected or derived one, such an one, in fact, as I derive from my natural experience, from my sensible limitations. Thus, if you take away my natural body, leaving no similar body in its place, you take away my sole ground of consciousness, the sole basis of my experience of the me, for I become conscious, or say me, only by virtue of my bodily constitution.

But now how would it do for God's creature to be without selfhood, without any consciousness of the me, that is without life? For life is life only in the ratio of the intensity of the individual consciousness, or of its own essential freedom. Why evidently it would do miserably: that is to say, it would degrade the creature—I was going to say—to a stone. But the stone enjoys an inert consciousness, or discloses the me under a form of inertia, and hence would still prove too flattering a similitude of the creature thus viewed. In truth the creature, in the case supposed, would be a strict zero infinitely below the mineral form even: and his Creator by implication would descend to the same level of nonentity, for there must always be an exact ratio between Creator and creature.

It is, accordingly, a fundamental postulate of all true or recognizable creation, that it be a living one, that the creature be endowed with selfhood or consciousness, and so placed in some rational proximity to his creative source. For it is the precise peculiarity and perfection of the creative name or quality, that He is infinite or unrelated, that is to say, without community of being. And selfhood images this creative peculiarity, this Divine perfection, putting the creature so far as he realizes it into exact correspondence with the Creator, and making Him a full participant or subject of the Divine infinitude.

But how shall the creature realize this selfhood in any degree, seeing that he is absolutely destitute of it? It is evident from the bare statement of his creatureship, that he is intrinsically void of life or selfhood, that his very nature is not to be. How then shall he surmount this intrinsic or natural destitution, and so arrive at selfhood, or conscious existence? This is the question. On the one hand, it is clear that he cannot be a creature of God, save in so far as he possesses selfhood: on the other, it is clear that he is intrinsically, or by nature destitute of selfhood. And the problem is to reconcile these two propositions, or to shew this intrinsic natural destitution of life giving place to the amplest and eternal exuberance of it.

But now does it not irresistibly follow from these premises, that creation is nothing more and nothing less than a process of redemption? Does it not follow, in other words, that all true or Divine creation rigidly consists in giving the creature redemption from his own nature, that is, in endowing him with selfhood? Bethink yourself. We have just seen that God's true creature is bound by the necessity of his creature-ship to possess selfhood or conscious life. And that same necessity binds him to be intrinsically void of life or selfhood, binds him to be in himself, or absolutely destitute of consciousness,—obliges him, in short, as to his own nature not to be. Do you not see then at a glance that God creates man, or gives him selfhood, only by giving him deliverance from this intrinsic void, only by redeeming him from this natural destitution? Of course you do, and I will therefore take the question for granted. But if creation consist in delivering the creature from his own nature, or endowing him with selfhood, then it becomes also instantly clear that unless we turn creation into a mere abstraction, or verbal juggle, the creature is bound to have a natural or finite projection, as well as a spiritual or perfect one,—is bound to experience a quasi or phenomenal existence, as well as a real or redeemed one,—is bound in short to know himself in an uncreated state, so to speak, as well as in a created one. I say this duplex consciousness is obligatory, because otherwise creation would not be a fact, but only a verbal fiction. God creates me or gives me being only in so far as He redeems me from my natural destitution, that destitution which stands in mere community of existence : and He redeems or lifts me out of this community by giving me selfhood, which is individual freedom or expansion. But obviously I shall have no power to appreciate or even accept this Divine boon, unless I am able to contrast it with my native destitution: unless, in other words, I first experience a certain community with my kind, which, finiting me on every hand, and under the sensible or outward show of life filling my bosom with the spiritual and inward consciousness of death, bids me aspire with invincible yearnings after the real and imperishable life that comes from God alone.

Thus Nature avouches itself an inexpugnable necessity of the Divine creation. The natural world is implied in the spiritual world, just as the foundation of a house is implied in the superstructure, or the shell of a nut implied in the kernel. That is to say, it exists not for its own sake primarily, but for the sake of the use it promotes to a superior life. The foundation of a house may within its own limits be very commodiously disposed: it may be extremely well heated, lighted, and watered; may display unequalled kitchen, laundry, and dairy resources, and contain comfortable accommodation of all sorts for the servants: but clearly it will be what it is only with reference to the superstructure. Because the house itself, as to its magisterial portion, is of an uncommon excellence, it demands a corresponding excellence in these its subordinate or ministerial parts. So also the shell of a nut may be thick or thin, hard or soft, rough or smooth, but whatever be its concho-logical peculiarities, they will be altogether determined by the necessities of the interior fruit or kernel. Precisely so with the natural life. It may exhibit within itself any amount of splendour and comfort, but it is none the less tributary on that account to the superior world. In truth, its proper splendour and wealth will accrue exactly in the measure of its subserviency to the demands of the higher life, that is, in the ratio of its use.

It is on this point precisely that the orthodox theology and philosophy signalize their inherent incapacity to furnish us with a true doctrine of Nature, or confess themselves utterly unscientific. Our popular theologians and philosophers have no idea that nature is but a correspondence by inversion of spirit, just as the foundation of a house is a correspondence by inversion of the superstructure, as the shell of a nut is an inverse correspondence of the kernel, or the outside of a glove an inverse correspondence of its inside. On the contrary, they deem the natural world to possess an independent existence, to exist for its own sake, or constitute its own end; and consequently they have declined, both classes alike, into mere Naturalism. The current theology and philosophy are both alike naturalistic, whence we now have Unitarianism as the only vital theologic doctrine extant, and Atheism or Pantheism as the only vital philosophic doctrine.

We live under the Iscariot apostolate. The star of the forlorn Judas culminates at length in our ecclesiastical horizon, and we have little left to do but to burst asunder in the midst, or resolve our once soaring Divine hopes into the mere poetry and sentimentality of nature. There is scarcely a theologian in the land who does not tacitly regard the soul as a thing; and he who was recently the idolized chief of your philosophic hordes, habitually regarded infinitude as identical with the totality of space and time, and under that conception very properly execrated it as an "IMBECILITY of the human mind." One can easily imagine the very inconsiderable figure which Sir William Hamilton, supposing him to be the same man intellectually that he was a few months ago, makes among the unsophisticated—or rather the *des*sophisticated—angels. Looking as he did upon the infinite as meaning in respect to space the all of space, and in respect to time the all of time, he must of course either deny God altogether (that is, acknowledge Atheism to be the final flower of Philosophy), or else identify Him with the natural universe (that is, acknowledge Pantheism to be the upshot of Philosophy). And both the Atheist and Pantheist, according to Swedenborg's lively daguerreotypes of trans-sepulchral existence, experience an immense deal of pulmonary oppression in angelic atmospheres. In truth I am afraid that those innocent angels will turn out rather "slow" people to most of our grandees, sacred and profane: they are so little skilled in our operose intellectual gymnastics, and acknowledge God so much more as little children than as turgid and palpitating athletæ. However there may be new-fashioned angels as well as new-fashioned men, nay there must be: and we will not doubt therefore for an instant that every honest inquirer will yet find himself, in spite of any amount of latent atheism and pantheism, in the divinest possible circumstances. Cheerfully according the theologian and philosopher then so excellent a look-out, let us leave them for the present to ask, in the light of all that has gone before, what is the precise intellectual infirmity designated by Naturalism? When we say that Naturalism is the disease of our current divinity and metaphysics, what do we mean to indicate by that word?

We mean to indicate the prevalent habit of regarding Nature as an absolute or positive existence, and not as the mere inverse and negative aspect of spirit. Naturalism limits the reason by the senses; it accepts as final the testimony of sense affirming the identity of being and appearance, substance and shadow, or what is the same thing, affirming that all real existence is constituted of space and time. The consistent naturalist says in all his thought, "I am inwardly and spiritually what I outwardly and physically ap- pear: that is to say, as I am naturally distinct from and disunited with all existence, so am I also spiritually distinct and disunited: and distinct and disunited existences deny unity of origin, deny that one and the same Creator could produce so many divergent creatures.”

Thus the naturalist limits the reason by the senses, or allows the phenomenal to dominate the real. Not seeing that Nature is but the inverse of spirit, that natural variety and difference are but the inverse correspondential expression of spiritual unity, he allows the former to dominate the latter, and conceives of the soul as existing only in bodily conditions, the conditions of time and space. Going to the mirror for instruction as well as information, for wisdom as well as knowledge: asking it, not how things appear to what is below themselves, but how they exist to themselves: he becomes hopelessly duped, and ends by not knowing his right hand (spiritually) from his left, or his heels from his head. Misled by what Swedenborg calls the sensuous lumen, the mere light of Nature, we invariably immerse spiritual existence in material dimensions, or subject it to time and space. Denying the unity of the soul in God, thus the unity of humanity, we split the spiritual creature up into as many conflicting and independent and selfish souls, as Nature exhibits of bodies. In short, the naturalist, instead of making nature and spirit twin aspects of one and the same consciousness, as that consciousness is viewed either subjectively or objectively: instead of seeing both the natural and the spiritual universe alike included in the unity of the conscious me, both alike pervaded by the unitary human soul, both alike embraced in humanity, in short: gives them the reciprocal independence and obtuseness of two peas, and so leaves them utterly and eternally destitute of rational accord.

Yours truly,

LETTER XII.

Paris, Dec. 15th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.,

THE incomparable depth and splendour of Swedenborg's genius are shewn in this, that he alone of men has ever dared to bring creation within the bounds of consciousness—within the grasp of the soul. He alone has dared to give to Nature human unity, to endow it with the proportions of man. This is the fundamental distinction between his genius and that of all our other great writers, that while they, by exteriorating object to subject, Creator to creature, God to man, materialize man's motives, and so construct a grossly sensual Theology, and an utterly selfish Ethics; he in interiorating object to subject, God to man, spiritualizes man's motives, and consequently constructs a Theology which places God exclusively within the soul, and an Ethics whose sanctions lie in the demands of our endless spiritual development, and no longer in the arbitrary pleasure of any foreign power. As it is impossible to comprehend the laws of creation without a clear perception of the rational truth on this subject, I shall make no apology for dwelling upon it a while longer. I simply seek to familiarize you with the fundamental truth of Swedenborg's system, which is that God is essential man, and that all creation consequently is in human form, being everywhere pervaded by consciousness more or less perfectly pronounced.

In a former letter I shewed you that the me absorbs the whole realm of the finite, the domain of sensible experience, the outer sphere, so to speak, of consciousness. The not-me equally absorbs the realm of the infinite, the domain of spiritual experience, or the inner sphere of consciousness. Consciousness forms the dividing and yet uniting line between infinite and finite. It is the hyphen which separates yet unites the object and subject, the not-me and the me. Whatsoever is on the hither side of consciousness, whatsoever is sensibly discerned as mineral, vegetable and animal, is finite and falls below the me. The me dominates it. Whatsoever is on the thither side of consciousness, whatsoever is spiritually discerned, as goodness, truth and beauty, in short character, is infinite and falls above the me. The me aspires to this infinitude, cultivates it, worships it. Consciousness, or life, unites this higher and lower realm, giving us the beautiful mineral, the graceful shrub, the gentle animal, the good man. The grammatical adjustment of adjective and substantive is only a formula of the copulation which all life or consciousness implies between object and subject, between infinite and finite, between the not-me and the me. This is the invariable meaning of consciousness: the copulation of an interior object with an exterior subject; the marriage of a universal substance with a specific form. Wherever there is organized life or consciousness, there is the coupling or congress of an interior infinite object with an exterior finite subject: the marriage of a universal and invisible substance with a specific and visible form: the life or consciousness being high or low, rich or poor, human or inhuman, precisely as this marriage is more or less perfectly pronounced. In short, consciousness or life invariably asserts the union of a universal interior substance with a particular exterior form, the life being more or less perfect, that is human, just as the union in question is more or less complete in the subject, that is to say, just as the individual subject is capable of universalizing himself, of adjusting himself to universal relations.

According to this definition, man is the highest form of consciousness, because in him alone is the individual element proportionate to the universal. Man is the only universal form. He stands related to universal nature, on the one hand, by what he possesses in common with it, and to God on the other, by what he possesses over and above such natural community. He is related to the mineral forms of nature, by gravitation and consequent inertia: to its vegetable forms by sensation and consequent growth: to its animal forms by volition and consequent motion; while he alone claims relationship with God, or the infinite, by what he alone possesses; namely, spontaneity, or the power of unforced individual action. The animal does not originate his own action, that is, is destitute of spontaneity. He acts wholly from the control of his nature. And man, so far as he is animal, does the same thing. But in so far as he is man, he acts from taste or individual attraction, that is to say, originates his own action, or exhibits spontaneity. The mineral is the least perfect or human form of life, because it exhibits the universal element in such superior force or volume to the individual one. Gravitation, inertia, rest in space, is what all existence possesses in common. And yet the mineral which expresses this common characteristic, is the lowest form of existence. Indeed, philosophers utterly deny life or consciousness to the mineral form, because the individual, or formal and feminine, element, is so inferior in it to the universal, or substantial and masculine, element. The latter element almost swallows up the former, nearly reducing the mineral to what the philosophers call "a simple substance."

But this denial is premature. Consciousness belongs to the mineral realm as truly, though not so distinctly, of course, as to the vegetable and animal. It is the most diffused or common form of consciousness, and therefore the least obvious to human apprehension. For man being the most distinct or pronounced form of life, that is to say, harbouring the universe in his private individuality, is at the utmost possible remove from communism, and hence finds it very difficult to appreciate or even acknowledge a life which simply expresses that. But nevertheless the fact is so. Mineral life or consciousness is no doubt very base compared with the human, but still it is real. It is, no doubt, very base and imperfect compared even with the vegetable or animal. For vegetable growth, and animal motion, are much less diffused or communistic forms of life than mineral inertia or rest. But imperfect as it is, it is still life. It is indeed the base of all higher life or consciousness, vegetable growth and animal motion being only modifications of that base operated by the advancing life of nature, by the exigencies of the perfect or human form. The perfect or human form is that which exactly unites or marries what is universal and what is individual, the sympathies of every well-developed man relating him to the entire universe of being. Mineral life is the first step towards this perfected life. It is the arrest of chaos. Originally or in the uncreated state of man, so to speak, Creator and creature, God and man, are undistinguishable one from the other. And Nature in her earliest or fluid beginnings does but exactly symbolize this indistinction. All things are then chaotically blent. Confusion reigns: that is to say, there exists a sensible fusing together and indistinction of all forms of individuality, of all forms of life or consciousness, under strictly universal forms. And the entire scope of what we call history is to reduce this chaos to order, to lift up this sobbing and prostrate universe into beautiful and joyous and individual form, to train this mute and melancholy and boundless nature into the free and glorified lineaments of human personality or character.

The mineral form then is the earliest or lowest evolution of the me. It is the me in an intensely inert state, in a passive state or state of rest simply. It is the me getting place or position first, in order to its subsequent experience of growth in the vegetable form, motion in the animal, and action in the human form. We may say that it is the me in a fœtal state, conceived but not yet born. Mineral life bears the same relation to vegetation and animation, that the fœtus bears to fully developed bodily life. Being destitute as yet of sensation, of sensibility to outward existence, it is of course devoid of visible form or individuality, and loses itself in the womb of the common mother. But the phenomena of crystallization shew that the life-process is going on all the while not less really though invisibly, or within the still enveloping womb of Nature, so that at least very marked tendencies to specific form result, as we see in the characteristic differences of iron and sulphur, alum and arsenic, gold and lead, silver and copper. Were there no observable differences in these things, did they not exhibit each a different relation towards the common mineral life, which is inertia or tendency to rest, we could never have named them. But if you admit mineral differences together with a universal mineral nature, you admit mineral life or consciousness. For life or consciousness means nothing else than the union of a common nature with a specific form.

But I will return to this topic in another letter.

Yours truly,

_____.

LETTER XIII.

Paris, Dec. 20th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.,

TAKING humanity in its largest scope, we may say that the mineral kingdom forms its osseous structure, or gives it stability: the vegetable kingdom forms its fleshly structure, or gives it sensation and consequent growth: the animal kingdom forms its nervous structure, or gives it volition and consequent motion: while man is the regal selfhood to which all these kingdoms tend, in which they all culminate, and by the mediation of which, all finite as they are, they connect with the infinite. Thus we may place mineral existence very low in the scale of humanity, but we have no right to exclude it from that scale. The characteristic of mineral life is inertia or rest, while that of perfected human life is freedom or progress. But how is progress possible without a starting point, and a starting point moreover perpetually renewed? Or how is freedom conceivable without the contrast of some fixity? What is freedom indeed but an eternal escape or rising away from all fixity and routine? Thus, if you deny the mineral element in humanity, you deny its principle of identity, or that thing which houses it under all changes of sky, keeping it fresh and sweet and immutable through eternal years, as when it knew only the maternal embrace. It is, in fact, as I have already said, the foetal condition of humanity. It is the precise form of life exhibited by the human foetus, while it absorbs from the enveloping heavens and earth of the maternal bosom, those increments of corporeity which shall one day extrude it from that tender abode, and impel it through all the vicissitudes of vegetable growth, animal motion, and human action, into full acknowledgment of the infinite, into final union with God. It is not so dignified a form of life then, let us grant, as many others, but our own consciousness fully attests its reality. We have no need to descend into the bowels of the earth, to ask the gold, the sulphur, or other mineral existence, whether it have any and what form of life or consciousness, for we ourselves involve the mineral consciousness, and can accurately describe it. We often experience the mineral life or consciousness, as, for example, when we fall from a height to the ground, or merely from a perpendicular to a horizontal position. Evidently that thing which my body possesses in common with all bodies, namely, gravitation, and which makes it incessantly tend

with all bodies to a common centre, is what alone produces the fall. If you take away my mineral characteristics, or that most diffused and common nature which links me to all other bodies, you take away my liability to fall. You destroy me as a subject of the mineral nature. But now in these mineral experiences of ours, the me does not cease to exist. It simply undergoes a transient degradation, and from being intensely exerted, becomes suddenly intensely inert. What is human in us, and what should ensure us the obedience of all lower nature, becomes as it were inverted and threatened with immersion or suffocation under lowest forms. For in this mineral experience, we keenly perceive that the me or individual and feminine element, instead of concurring with the universal and masculine element—instead of bringing forth fruit to it instinctively like the vegetable, or voluntarily like the animal, or spontaneously like man—is dominated or coerced by it, and hence yields it in place of the hearty co-operation which the wife yields the husband, only the grudging, and struggling, and rebellious submission the slave gives the master. It is an in-ertion of the me, so to speak, or the me vigorously resisting the dominion of mere natural community, instead of an ex-ertion of it, which supposes nature already separated and subordinate. It is the me getting body, and this rudimentary body, as we know from its analogy in the fœtus, is long destitute of perfect human form. It is the very core and back-bone of the me that is forming, the very centre and focus of consciousness, and the less vital but more demonstrative periphery, like the still undeveloped extremities of the fœtus, is tenderly latent in that. This is all the difference. The mineral life is just as real as the vegetable or the animal life, only it is as the life of the most vital viscera of the body which shun the eye, compared with that of the surface and extremities. The vegetable and animal forms of life are only so many—not more real—but more sensuous evolutions of the me which is latent in the mineral. What is inertia in the mineral, or the simple statics of the me, becomes sensation in the vegetable and volition in the animal, which are dynamic declarations of the me. Did the me not first wear this form of inertia,—this form of resistance to the overwhelming fluidity and community of nature, it would never burst forth in the higher or vegetable form of sensation. The mineral inertia marks the initiatory protest of the me against total community of nature: it is the beginning of that absorption which all mere community is bound to undergo into beautiful and distinctive form: vegetable growth, animal motion, and human action, only record the successive triumphs in which that initiatory protest ends. How beautiful the phenomenon of vegetable growth! Here we see this chaotic, this communistic and formless nature, sopped up, so to speak, and trained into forms of exquisitely modulated variety: in other words, we see this vast and vague and overpowering universality becoming personal and human, becoming resolved into clearer and clearer individuality. The animal life is only a more advanced evidence of the same process, is only a still more vivid picture of the inevitable marriage between infinite and finite, while in man the marriage culminates, and we see all nature at last joyfully acknowledging her sovereign Lord, or Divinity perfectly glorified in Humanity.

I hold, then, that there is no such thing as unorganized, unconscious, or dead existence; but I hold this incidentally to my main proposition, which is that all life is a form of consciousness, of a joint or composite self-knowledge, implying the union of an interior object with an exterior subject, the marriage of a vivifying succulent nature with a dependent specific form. It is this marriage-union which invariably determines what we call the selfhood, or personality of the subject. Hence the mistake of the Idealist in denying nature a soul of her own, and making her sensible qualities inhere in a foreign subject. The Idealist denies the substantiality or absoluteness of Nature within her own plane, and hence affronts the universal conviction of mankind which attributes to nature a personality quite independent of her sensible properties. This personality is not a phenomenon of sense. You cannot resolve it into any sense, nor any number of senses. The selfhood of the pear-tree does not lie in the form of the tree as determined by my eye, nor its odor as determined by the nose, nor its solidity as determined by the touch, nor yet by all these things put together: but simply in its power of proliferation, that is to say, its power to propagate its own nature. So also the selfhood or individuality of the horse does not consist of his sensible properties, or those things which relate him to our intelligence, but of his natural faculty of reproduction, or what is the same thing, his subjection to the motions of his invisible nature. In short, all life, all personality, all character, dates from the union in question, confesses itself the offspring of a marriage between an objective controlling nature, and a subjective obedient form. Undoubtedly, as I have already observed, the resultant form is low or high, poor or rich, exactly as the marriage is ill or well pronounced, that is, as the formal and feminine element is freely instead of servilely related to the substantial and masculine element. But whatever variations characterize natural forms, they all equally confess themselves the progeny of a marriage between an interior controlling nature and an exterior submissive form.

But now you know that a very marked difference obtains between the human form, or personality, and that of mere mineral, vegetable, or animal existence. It is true, that the human form, equally with these lower forms, confesses itself the offspring of a marriage between a common nature and a specific subject. Rather let me say, that the human form makes this confession with supreme distinctness: for the marriage in question is so much more emphatically pronounced in that form, that it may be said to be comparatively unpronounced in every other. For example, every mineral, every vegetable, and every animal form, while they exhibit great reciprocal diversity, yet sink into the same undistinguishable level before the universality of man. Take the highest of these forms, the animal. Compared with the vegetable and mineral forms of life, the animal ranks heaven high by the bare fact of will and consequent motion. But when you view the animal form in itself, when you ask how it stands related to the universal life, you instantly see that it has no individuality answering to that universality. In short, you find no unitary animal form below the human. The lion is out of all unison with the cow, the fox with the sheep, the serpent with the dove: look where you will, diversity not unity, discord not concord, is the law of animal life. One animal preys upon another; one half of the animal kingdom lives by destroying the other half. Now man, so far as his natural form is concerned, resumes all these distinctive differences of the lower natures, and fuses them in the bosom of his own unity. He is not only devouring as the fire, and unstable as the water: he is fixed as the rock, hard as the iron, sensitive as the flower, graceful and flowing as the vine, majestic as the oak, lowly as the shrub. But especially does he reproduce in himself all the animal characteristics. He is indolent as the sloth, he is busy as the bee, he is stupid as the ox, he is provident as the beaver, he is blind as the bat, he is far-sighted as the eagle, he grovels like the mole, he soars like the lark, he is bold as the lion, timid as the fawn, cunning as the fox, artless as the sheep, venomous as the serpent, harmless as the dove: in short, all the irreconcilable antagonisms of animate nature meet and kiss one another in the unity of the human form. It perfectly melts and fuses the most obdurate contrarieties in the lap of its own universality. It is this universality of the human form which endows it with the supremacy of nature, and fits it to embosom the Divine infinitude. Because it adequately resumes in its own unity the universe of life; because it sops up, so to speak, and reproduces in its own individuality all mineral, all vegetable, and all animal forms, it claims the rightful lordship of nature, or coerces nature under its own subjection. Thus the marriage I speak of is perfectly ratified only in the human form, because in that form alone does the feminine or individual element bear any just ratio to the masculine and universal one. In short, man is the sole measure of the universe, because he alone combines in the form of his natural individuality every conceivable characteristic of universal life.

It is clear, therefore, that although man may be said to be subject to his nature just as truly as the horse and the rose are subject to theirs, yet the human nature is of such a measureless scope and dignity, claims such a universal pith and variety, as to lift all its subjects at one and the same coup out of the realm of physics, and bring that realm within the invincible grasp of their subjectivity. Physics ends precisely where man begins. Mineral, vegetable, and animal exist only to endow his commanding individuality, only to universalize his form, only to give him a basis broad enough to image the Creator's infinitude. He is the dazzling blossom of the universe, the peerless fruit by whose interior chemistry unripe Nature ripens all her juices to gladden the heart of creative Love. Thus by the very law of its creation all nature aspires to the human form, confessing itself the mere blind type and stuttering prophecy of that unmatched perfection. In a word, nature acknowledges herself contained in man, cheerfully dons his livery, and obediently reflects his life.

We can have no difficulty now in estimating the exact difference between man and all lower forms of life. He, at his lowest, is a universal form of life : they, at their highest, are only partial forms. In this distinction is expressed all the distance between man and nature, between human history and mere animal or vegetable growth and decay, between man's eternal progress and nature's eternal immobility, between the starry splendours in short of human society or fellowship, and the dull ungenial fires of mere brute community. For it is this difference which makes man a fit subject of God, and suspends nature's alliance with Him only on man's mediation. But this subject can hardly be broached short of another letter, and for the present I subscribe myself,

Yours truly,

LETTER XIV.

Paris, Dec. 25th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

I HAVE now virtually answered the question which in my ninth Letter I represented you as asking, namely: how the rectification of our intellectual methods recommended by Swedenborg, avails to give us a right apprehension of creation, and promote a truly scientific cosmology. That is to say, I have alleged nearly all the considerations which determine the answer to that question, and little remains but to draw the answer out in legible characters. But before doing this, I want to fix your attention upon what I have already discussed, but what I have not perhaps sufficiently insisted upon, and that is, the immense peculiarity or distinction of the human form. I have shewn you that creation is bound by the creative unity to wear a unitary form, and that this unitary form is that of humanity. Now what is the human form as distinguished from all lower forms? What is the distinctive form of man, his form as contrasted with the animal or vegetable or mineral form?

In one word, it is a spiritual form, and if you now ask me what I mean by a spiritual form, I reply that I mean a form which is enlivened or empowered exclusively from within; a form, in other words, whose activity invariably reflects its own free spirit or selfhood, and disavows all outward constraint. This is the only form adequate to the Divine subjection, adapted to the Divine inhabitation. God does not create life of course, (for life is uncreated), but only forms of life, to which He incessantly communicates life by His own spiritual indwelling. Inasmuch, therefore, as God is life itself, inasmuch as His infinitude or perfection flows from His character, derives from Himself, and is accordingly altogether spiritual, disclaiming all outward genesis, you are bound of course to exact a responsive image in His creature. You are bound to exact a creature, the form of whose life shall be intensely spiritual, and natural only in furtherance of that. God, being the infinite or perfect spirit He is, cannot create—cannot give being—to a lower or unspiritual style of life. A lower style of life in the creature would argue a finite Creator, would exclude a perfect Divine original.

Now spiritual life, that style of life which expresses the selfhood or freedom of the subject, and which consequently characterizes him, is emphatically human life. This is precisely the definition of humanity, namely, the power of free or characteristic action, the faculty of spontaneous life, the ability to obey in all cases one's own taste or attraction in opposition to physical or moral constraint. We feel that life is human in proportion as it is free, that is, in proportion as its merely external, natural, or communistic element freely subserves its internal, spiritual, and private element. This is the reason why we instinctively dislike Pharisaism, or an inflated state of the moral consciousness. The Pharisee is filled with a sense of his own merit, because he has denied himself, because in obedience to some law of the community, he has refrained from doing as he otherwise would have done: and we instinctively feel that a man should be ashamed of a virtue which proceeds only upon his own suppression, which exists only in so far as he renounces his own freedom. We have, indeed, more hope of the publican and harlot than of such a man, because so long as this man prides himself upon what really avouches his own degradation, he puts himself out of all true relation to conscience, and instead of finding it a minister of death, a flaming sword keeping the way of the tree of Life, discovers it to be a Divinely blunt and bland witness of his own righteousness, and hence feels himself very properly acquitted of any obligations to a coming Divine righteousness: while the publican and harlot, on the contrary, being denied all moral righteousness, all righteousness in themselves as contrasted with other men, are extremely likely to lend a gratified ear to every Divine promise in that direction. In a word, the desperate evil of Pharisaism is that it leaves one content with a finite life or righteousness, such as flows from a completely servile relation to the obligations of natural community, and so disqualifies him to appreciate that infinite life or righteousness which stands in a relation of free superiority to our nature, and of consequent intimate conjunction with God. The publican and harlot are comparatively void of this disqualification, and hence lend themselves far more cordially to Divine medication. Verily, verily, I say unto you, the first shall be last, and the last first.

However this may be, I repeat that it is the precise distinction of human life or action that it is free, that it is spontaneous, that it always dates from within the subject, that it obeys only an interior motive, and disclaims both physical and social coercion. Eating and drinking to supply the needs of one's nature, are not distinctively human attributes: they belong to man on his animal side, or as he stands related to his physical organization. He is not free accordingly to forego his physical action, nor consequently is he free in producing it. He would starve if he did not produce it. His moral activity is just as servile and uncharacteristic. It belongs to man on his social side, or as he stands related to his fellow-man, and he is not free to forego it. His relations to his family, to his tribe, to the community in which he lives, impose certain obligations upon him by the promise of certain rewards, or at all events the menace of certain punishments, and he must either obey or suffer. He must do whatever the law of his community prescribes to him, or he must be socially banned and punished, perhaps killed. Thus neither the natural nor social side of man, neither his physical nor his moral action, reflect his distinctively human character. The natural and social side of man, the realm of his relations to nature and society, is the realm of LAW or fixity, in which he is only apparently free, while really he is in invincible bondage. The spiritual or interior side of man, the realm of his relations to God, what we may properly call his supernatural realm, is the sphere of his veritable LIFE, in which he is not only apparently, but also most really free. To employ Swedenborg's terminology, delight is the essence or motive of this life. Whatsoever the subject does he does from the pure delight of doing it, from attraction, from inward taste, or spontaneity. It is as Swedenborg phrases it, a life of cordial or spontaneous use, meaning thereby an æsthetic life, a life of free productivity, utterly ignoring the stimulus either of physical necessity or moral obligation.

Surely no argument is needed to sustain these positions. Clearly if the distinctive life of man lay in his relations to nature, then we should never see him renouncing natural obligations, the obligations he owes to his own body. We might, it is true, see him dying just as the animals die, but we should never see him committing suicide. And so also if his distinctive life were moral, or lay in his relations to his fellow-man, we should never see him capable of renouncing those relations, or violating the duties they impose. We might find him perishing under the exactions of society, but we should certainly never see him as now contemning his social obligations, and deriding the penalties which society thereupon affixes. Doubtless no one can act from a superior plane to that of his own life. If, then, nothing is more common than to see men renouncing their physical and social subjection, we must allow that they do so only in obedience to the instincts—blind it may be and unenlightened, but still most real—of a life which is yet more truly their own. Human life, in a word, is not primarily natural, does not acknowledge a physical origin: or we should have no suicide. Neither is it primarily moral, flowing from a social origin: or we should be destitute of moral evil. Nothing has been more common in the past than to see man obstructing, mortifying, harassing his natural body with a view to some ideal or spiritual end. It is as if the more vital life within were in such haste to come to consciousness, that it could hardly forbear to usurp the natural organs. And certainly nothing is more common now-a-days than to see men obstructing and embarrassing their moral life, the life which flows from their relations to society, with a view to some interior spiritual ease. The poor struggling wretch is all unconscious of the sacred instincts which at the bottom animate his perverse activity: he can tell you nothing, because intellectually he knows nothing, of the profound human want, the want of freedom, which like the breath of the whirlwind hurries him on: on the contrary, he will very probably accept your otiose and overbearing hypothesis of the ease, and say that he does evil, simply because he is an evil man unworthy of human love, worthy rather of human scorn, worthy only of Divine and human vengeance. But all this is sheer insanity on his part and ours. There are no fundamental differences in men. All men have one and the same Creator, one and the same essential being, and what formally differences one man from another, what distinguishes hell from heaven, is that they are differently related to the Divine natural humanity, or to the life of God in nature, which is a life of perfect freedom or spontaneity. In that life self-love freely subordinates itself to neighbourly love, or promotes its own ends by promoting the welfare of all mankind. But so long as this life is wholly unsuspected by men, so long as no man dreams of any other social destiny for the race than that which it has already realized, and which leaves one man out of all fellowship or equality with another, self-love is completely unprovided for, except in subtle and hypocritical forms, and is consequently driven to these disorderly assertions of itself by way of actually keeping itself alive. Thus, whether he is unconscious of the truth or not, no man is evil save for want of free development, save for want of a closer walk with God than the existing Church and State agree to tolerate. The liar, the thief, the adulterer, the murderer, no doubt utterly perverts the Divine life which is latent in every human form: he degrades and defiles self-love, in lifting it out of that free subordination which it will evince to brotherly love in the Divine natural man: but he nevertheless does all this in the way of a mute unconscious protest against an overwhelming social tyranny, which would otherwise crush out the distinctive life of man under the machinery of government and caste. Accordingly, I am profoundly convinced that if it had not been for these men, if we had not had some persons of that audacious make which would qualify them to throw off their existing social subjection, and so ventilate, even by infernal airs, the underlying life and freedom of humanity, that life and freedom would have been utterly stifled, and we should now be a race of abject slaves, without hope towards God, without love to our fellow-man, contentedly kissing the feet of some infallible Pope of Rome, contentedly doing the bidding of some unquestionable Emperor of all the Russias. These men have been, unknown to themselves, the forlorn hope of humanity, plunging headlong into the unfathomable night, only that we by the bridge of their desecrated forms might eventually pass over its hideous abysses into the realms of endless day. Let us, then, at least manfully acknowledge our indebtedness to them : let us view them as the unconseious martyrs of humanity, dying for a cause so Divinely high as to accept no conseious or voluntary adhesion, and yet so Divinely sure and sweet and human as ultimately to vindicate even their dishonoured memory, and rehabilitate them in the love and tenderness of eternal ages. In short, let us agree with Swedenborg, that odious and fearful as these men have seemed in merely celestial light, they have yet borne the unrecognized livery of the Divine NATURAL humanity, and will not fail in the end to swell the triumphs of His majestic patience. And this simply because by an undying Divine instinct, under every depth of degradation celestially viewed, they have always been true to themselves, feeling themselves to be men and not devils, and over their scarred and riven legions have ever indestructibly waved the banner of a conscious freedom and rationality.*

But dismissing argument, I assume as indisputable my original proposition, which is, that the human form is essentially free or spontaneous. It is free or spontaneous because, as we have seen, its universal force freely yields to its individual force, or all that is natural and common in it serves only to promote what is spiritual and private. Hence alone is it a fit form of the Divine infinitude: hence alone does man avouch himself a proper subject of God. For the human form thus asserted exactly images God. The necessary conception we have of God is, that He is a universal Creator, or in plain English, that He alone gives being to all things. Thus we have individuality (God Himself), and universality (all things), both involved in the idea of God as a creator; and then, further, we have the universality confessing itself as subordinate to the individuality. All things derive from God. Obviously then the true creature of God must exactly image this creative perfection. He can neither fail to exhibit in his own consciousness the two elements of individuality and universality, nor yet to exhibit the latter element in a relation of perfect subjection to the former. He cannot avouch himself a creature otherwise. We cannot regard him as really created until we recognize him in this form, because, manifestly, any other form would be inadequate to God's inhabitation or indwelling. Creation is not the production of new being, but only the formal manifestation of a being which, being infinite and eternal, is never new and never old, which is without beginning and without end, and which, therefore, utterly ignores those laws of time and space on which its mere manifestation is contingent. In other words, God creates or gives us being only in so far as He first gives us form, only in so far as He first makes us images of Himself, which forms or images He may then fill with all the fulness of His life and delight as a river fills its banks, or the air fills the lungs. It is, therefore, simply absurd to talk of our being created, until we have realized this needful form or imagery.

* Let me moreover remind the reader, here, that the hells, as we have seen in Letter IV., are purely excrementitious. Now in Swedenborg's time, the scientific appreciation of manures, in redeeming worn-out or vastated soils, was almost comparatively unknown; and he had accordingly scarcely any analogy to guide him as to the altogether splendid and benignant uses the hells promote in the sphere of the redeemed natural mind, or in obedience to the DIVINE NATURAL MAN. I have myself known thick-headed Dutch farmers in the valley of the Mohawk, in the State of New York, to sell off their homesteads, because there was such an accumulation of manure in their barn-yards as to render their barns and granaries almost inaccessible. Feeling the rich inheritance to be only an incumbrance and curse, because they knew nothing of the endless Divine blessing with which its steaming and odious bosom was fraught, they concluded to sell their exhausted farms rather than remove their barns, and with the proceeds go to buy new ones in the virgin soils of the West. Yet all around these precious heaps the grass grew so luxuriantly, that you would suppose stupidity itself would take a hint. But our spiritual husbandmen display the same obdurate contempt for the infernal element in humanity, nor ever dream that such priceless Divine renovation for the exhausted natural mind of man is stored away in those now nauseous and festering because useless forms, to which we give the generic title of the Devil. But the subject is too vast for a note.

It is quite common in loose discourse, no doubt, to confound creation, or the giving being to things, which is a purely spiritual process, with their making, or the giving them form, which is a purely natural process. It never seems to be popularly suspected that the two processes are so wholly discriminate as to be, in fact, reciprocally inversive. But all true Revelation rigidly proceeds upon such discrimination, as I shall shew you in my next.

Yours truly,

LETTER XV.

Paris, Dec. 28th, 1856.

MY DEAR W.

In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth WAS WITHOUT FORM AND VOID. Thus creating and making, or giving being and giving form, are two distinct things, and the mystic narrative of the six-days' work accordingly goes on to shew us the one becoming gradually proportionate to the other, until at last we reach the seventh, or perfected day, when we read: "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because in it He rested from all His work which He had CREATED TO MAKE." It is the unmistakeable mark of all true Revelation that it is constructed upon this rigid discrimination of being and form, of creating and making. All inspired writing involves a double sense: one spiritual, adapted to the rational eye exclusively; the other natural, adapted to the sensuous understanding. The internal sense alone is true, being full of the divinest and most ravishing particulars, just as a great muscle of the human body is full of minute fibres and fibrillas, too exquisitely individual to be discerned by the unassisted eye; while the external sense is made up of seeming or quasi truth, of truth in its most aggregated or common form, and bears, therefore, no more proportion to the vital Divine reality, than the gross muscle aforesaid does to the marvellous individual fibres of which it is the aggregation or accumulation. The spiritual sense gives us the eternal verity of creation, creation as regarded à parte Dei: the carnal sense gives us the form or appearance which this verity assumes to the consciousness of the creature. The spiritual sense alone claims objective truth: the latter possesses an exclusively subjective force. The one reveals the unchangcable being we have in God: the other tells us of the living evolution or formation which that being undergoes to our own consciousness.

Thus there is nothing arbitrary or irrational in this construction of the inspired cosmology. It takes place only because that cosmology really involves a far profounder philosophy of human life than has ever entered our best philosophic noddles to conceive. For the simple reason that we are created and not uncreate, our being must of necessity be entirely distinguishable from our form, must refer itself wholly to our Creator, while our form, on the other hand, is what identifies ourselves. "Creating" means giving being, causing to be. To create a thing is to give it inward being or substance. "Making," on the other hand, means giving form or causing to appear. To make a thing is to give it form or phenomenality. Creating is a spiritual or internal process, having reference to the real, substantial, and objective nature of things. Making is a natural or external process, having reference to the phenomenal, formal, and subjective nature of things. The former process would be known to the creative personality alone, and the latter fall exclusively within the created consciousness, if it were not that the Divine mercy is too grand to invest its creature with mere natural form alone, and therefore aspires to communicate its own deathless being to him as well. Thus creating affirms the being or substance of things, while making affirms their seeming, their appearance, their form. He who creates or gives being to a thing, is Himself the substance of the thing, and hence in so far as a thing should be created merely, it would be undistinguishable from its Creator. On the other hand, so far as a thing is made or formed, it is individualized and discernible from its creative source. All making or formation is development, is generation. A thing is made or formed by being brought out of something else. Every thing that has form supposes some precedent thing, or state, out of which it grows, or by means of which it is made to appear. The paper and the table upon which I write, the pen and the hand that holds the pen, and the body which sustains the hand, all these various forms or phenomena of existence suppose some precedent source, by virtue of which they themselves become manifest. They each suppose some sensible background giving it objective unity with, and subjective diversity from, all other existence. This duality of existence enters into the very conception of making or giving form, while the conception of creating or giving being, on the other hand, rigidly excludes duality, and shuts us up to the Creator alone. Hence creation is never a finite process, never falls within the laws of space and time, that is to say, within the intelligence of the thing created. It is a truly infinite process, pertaining wholly to the intelligence of the Creator. The being of the statue is in your mind; you create it or give it being in your thought, whence, indeed, it may never come into existence or form. But you make it or give it form only in so far as you bring it out of the rude marble, or separate it from the maternal womb. Your formative power may never, indeed, at any given time, equal your creative power: in other words, the being of the statue, or its created state, so to speak, may always transcend its form, or its made state. For this reason you will go on for ever reproducing your statue, or modifying its actual form, the better to express its ideal being. Now all this shews, analogically, that the creature, quâ a creature, or in so far as he is related to God, is never absolute or independent, confessing to have once upon a time derived life from his Creator, but to have possessed it ever since in himself. On the contrary, he is a perpetual creation, never ceasing at any moment to be created, that is, to be instinct and vivid with the life or personality of his Creator.

But now you will observe, that for this very reason, the creature must be made as well as created. Simply because there is no essential discrimination or discrepancy between Creator and creature, simply because, in other words, the Creator constitutes the sole and total being of the creature, it is evident that the latter can never come to life or consciousness, can never attain to the experience of his creation, unless he undergo a formative process as well as a creative one, and so become defined to his own intelligence. For as we have seen, making or formation is always a finite process, is always a strictly generative process, implying the development of one thing out of another, and hence falling within the range of the finite intelligence. Were the creature simply created, he would be pure spirit, undistinguishable from his Creator; he would be without form or selfhood, hence unintelligible to himself, or unconscious. For the created intelligence is incapable of apprehending truth in its infinitude, or save as it is reflected in finite forms.

We can no longer doubt, then, that the creature must also be made or formed, that is, must also be outwardly projected and defined to his own recognition, as well as spiritually conceived or created. Otherwise that mythic and primeval night in which all cosmogony begins, would reign alone where now the human mind discloses the varied imagery of God's endless perfection. And to give this requisite external projection or definition to God's creature, is, as we have already seen, the precise and unswerving ministry of what we call Nature. Nature is simply a formative process, which separates the creature to his own intelligence from the Creator, by giving him finiteness, by making him self-conscious. Viewed in whole and in part, Nature is nothing else than the mould, or form, in which God's stupendous creation is run, in order to its becoming conscious of itself, and so finally conscious of God, its truer and better self. Creation is a purely spiritual and invisible process, known only to the creative mind. Our natural generation is only a needful mirror of that sublimer process, is only a necessary medium through which the creature thus created becomes pronounced to his own consciousness, and so qualified for the blissful destiny that awaits him, namely, ultimate conscious unity with infinite Goodness, Truth, and Power. In short, spiritual life alone is real or substantial; natural life is purely formal, and hence intensely subordinate to that. Nature yields us only the appearance or semblance of being to a limited intelligence. Being itself is supernatural, and therefore unlimited.

Thus the inspired cosmology involves in its construction a far deeper philosophy of life than has yet transpired in our best books of philosophy so called. It is, in fact, actually based upon a discrimination so sharp between object and subject, between substance and form, between Creator and creature, as would put our most accredited philosophy out of its wits even to conceive of it, and make it incontinently renounce creation as a sheer incredibility, if not impossibility. For the discrimination in question places a gulf between God and man, between Creator and creature, not less impassable than that which separates substance from shadow, or the reality of a thing from its merely mirrored semblance or appearance. Surely our best philosophy would grow frantic if it were required, on any such data, to construct an intelligent theory of creation. And this, simply because philosophy wholly overlooks Christianity as furnishing the sole competent logic of creation, or in other words, because philosophy completely ignores another all-pervading feature of revealed and historic truth, which I shall now proceed to bring before you. No truth is so intimately and characteristically blent as this with the living experience of man: no truth has been so exclusively operative (I might say) upon the developments of human history—all history, in fact, being only its protracted witness and reverberation: and yet our puffy and pretentious Philosophy, nevertheless, disdains even to name its name.

The truth in question, when viewed on its human side, is known under the familiar name of REGENERATION; when viewed on its Divine side it is called REDEMPTION. Let us first fix our attention upon it as it presents itself to us in the sacred symbol.

As I have just said, the opening page of Revelation sharply discriminates between being and form, between Creator and creature. We have first the Creator presented to us, the creature being still undeveloped. God creates or gives being ab origine, but the result of the creative energy is still invisible, the creature being unformed and unconscious, being without form and void. Creation is yet altogether spiritual, shut up to the creative mind, but the order of it as there existing is clearly given in the programme of the operations of “the Divine spirit, when brooding over the face of the waters.” Here the ideal form and destiny of man are symbolically but vividly sketched under the various features of the six-days’ work and the seventh-day rest, his constitutional divisions of affection and intellect, with all their minor derivations and powers being distributed under the names of heaven and earth, the greater and lesser lights, the day and night, the grass and herb and fruit-tree, the moving creature, the flying-fowl, the fish, the cattle and creeping thing, and so forth, until in the sixth or final working day, the dominant or binding form of all these passive and active powers is complete in man the image of God, male and female.

This is a picture of man on his created and unconscious side, or as he exists to the Divine mind exclusively, for we are immediately informed that such were the births of the heavens and the earth in the day when they were created, that is in the day when the Lord God made them, before they were visible to any one else, and when He made every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew: for as yet there had been no rain upon the earth, and no man existed. But now next of course we go on to read (always symbolically, remember) of his natural formation, and of his being placed in a garden, and his leading a life there of Paradisiacal ease and opulence. I say "next of course," because, as we have already seen, our natural selfhood, or the life we derive from nature, is the necessary basis of our spiritual development, is the indispensable matrix or mould by which we attain to our true self-consciousness as a purely Divine creation. Unless we had enjoyed this previous lower experience, unless we had first known ourselves naturally, or been indued with natural form, our higher or spiritual and divinely-given selfhood would have been destitute of all measure, of all ratio, would have been without any continent, so to speak, by means of which it could become manifested and appropriated. For example, if it were not for my natural ties to my parents, to my brothers and sisters, to my uncles and aunts and cousins, to my neighbours and friends, to my fellow-countrymen and my race, my selfhood, instead of becoming enlarged to universal dimensions would remain imprisoned under my physical limitations, and so present no form adequate to the Divine inhabitation. Thus these natural ties of kindred and of race, which gradually universalize the form of my consciousness, and endow me with a world-wide selfhood, are merely the germ, are merely so many rude husks and fostering envelopes, out of which is born in fulness of time the consummate and immortal spiritual flower. These natural ties fix as it were the supernatural reality, so enabling me, the child of a day, to become woven upon the substance of God, and breathe everlastingly the atmosphere of His incorruption. They are the mirrored semblances of the eternal and invisible Truth, and unless that truth had this preliminary projection to our sensible experience, it would forever remain impenetrable to our rational or spiritual understanding.

In Adam then, formed from the dust and placed in Eden, we find man's natural evolution distinctly symbolized—his purely instinctual and passional condition—as winning and innocent as infancy no doubt, but also, happily, quite as evanescent. It is his purely genetic and pre-moral state, a state of blissful infantile delight unperturbed as yet by those fierce storms of the intellect which are soon to envelope and sweep it away, but also unvisited by a single glimpse of that Divine and halcyon calm of the heart, in which these hideous storms will finally rock themselves to sleep. Nothing can indeed be more remote (except in pure imagery) from distinctively human attributes, or from the spontaneous life of man, than this sleek and comely Adamic condition, provided it should turn out an abiding one: because man in that case would prove a mere dimpled nursling of the skies, without ever rising into the slightest Divine communion or fellowship, without ever realizing a truly Divine manhood and dignity. He is still a mere natural form sprung from the dust, vivified by no Diviner breath than that of the nostrils, mere unfermented dough, insipid and impracticable: and the Lord makes haste accordingly to add the spiritual leaven which shall ensure his endless rise into human, and ultimately Divine proportions. He brings him Eve, or spiritually quickens him; for Eve, according to Swedenborg, symbolizes the Divinely vivified selfhood of man. The Adamic dough, heavy and disheartening before, becomes lively enough now in all conscience, becomes instinct and leaping with vitality, although that vitality has no more positive form than a protest against death, a struggle against mortality. Thus had we had Adam, "male and female," alone for a progenitor, we should never have emerged from our Edenic or infantine gristle: we should have remained for ever in a state of Paradisiac childishness and imbecility: in a word, we should have been destitute of our most human characteristic, which is history or progress. We should have had mineral body and consequent inertia, no doubt: we should have had vegetable form and consequent growth; we should have had animal life and consequent motion: but we should have been without all power of human action, because we should have lacked that constant permeation and interpenetration of our spirits by the living spirit of God, which weaves our pallid natural annals into the purple tissue of history, and separates man from nature by all the plenitude and power of incarnate Deity. Human history dates from Eve. Existence dates from Adam, but life, or progress towards God, begins with Eve: hence she is named Eve, mother of all living. It is Eve, or the vivification of our natural earth by the Divine spirit, which disenchants us of our long Adamic babyhood, which emancipates us from Eden, which shews us first how full of inward death and horror is that imbecile being we have in Adam, only that we may subsequently see into what pregnant and delicious life this death becomes transmuted by God. For now begins the moral experience of man, that purely transitional stage of human experience, in which man discovers the corruption and death he has in himself as only naturally vivified, or unvivified by God, and which separates him on the one hand from the merely animal life of instinct, and on the other from the truly human one of spontaneity. This is the sole force and function of our moral experience, to release us inwardly from the Adamic clutch, and so leave us free to the Divine indwelling. God has no conceivable quarrel with the Adamic life in itself, but only as claiming our spiritual allegiance. On the contrary, when the natural man spontaneously disposes himself to serve the spiritual, he will find, unless all prophecy is illusory, a far ampler satisfaction of his wants Divinely secured to him, than he now so much as dreams of.

But I shall be obliged to reserve what I have still to say, for another Letter, and am meanwhile

Yours truly,

LETTER XVI.

Paris, Jan. 1, 1857.

MY DEAR W.

WE saw at the close of the last Letter, that the literal form which the revealed Truth puts on, in order to adapt itself to the carnal apprehension, is that of a Divine regeneration of man. The sacred narrative represents the Creator as developing a new life from out the ribs of the natural Adam, or as giving His creature a spiritual new-birth. The natural man is first represented as standing at the head of all created things, or rather, as involving in himself all lower forms of life: (for by Adam naming all cattle, etc., is signified that all earthly things derive their quality from man, being all only so many fragmentary exhibitions of human nature, name in the spiritual world meaning quality or character): and then we are told that God finds him still insufficient to himself, or alone, and proposes to furnish him with a suitable companion and helper.

What is the force of the word "alone" in this passage? What precise infirmity of the natural man is indicated by it? We may be very sure that a superb significance attaches to all this symbolism if we can discover it, and with the clue we already possess, I think we have no reason to distrust our ability to do so. Let me say, then, without any more circumlocution, that by Adam, or the natural man, being alone, is meant, that man on all his constitutional side, or in so far as he is related to nature and society, is destitute of real freedom, is without any true selfhood, or possesses only a phenomenal life, and hence is subject to mortality. Let me make this plain.

If you have read Swedenborg's luminous exposition of the laws of spiritual existence with due attention, you will have learned that all our natural affection and intelligence is derived to us from spiritual association. I have no self-love nor brotherly love, no love to my own body nor to the world, no love to parent or child, to brother or sister, to friend or neighbour, to man or woman, which is not a strict inflow to my heart from spiritual societies, celestial and infernal, with which I am connected by my natural generation, that is, by all my past ancestry. Neither have I any natural intelligence, any sense of good and evil, true and false, sweet and bitter, hard and soft, light and dark, but what comes to me from similar association. In a word, my nature is a simple inheritance or derivation to me from my past ancestry: it is nothing more and nothing less than an aggregate image and reflection of all the so-called good and evil men and women, to whom in endless complication I owe my sensible production. Thus to all the extent of my purely constitutional limits, that is, to all the extent of my physical and moral nature, I am a mere helpless product of the invisible spiritual world, without human character or dignity. Indeed, I am so wholly constituted as to my affection and thought by spiritual association and influx, that I should even be without my distinctive human form, if it were not for God's profounder grasp of me, or the quickening operations of His infinite spirit within our nature. Had I had no profounder life than that which binds me to nature and society, were I not related to God more profoundly than I am related either to my own body or to my fellow-man, I should have remained mere dove or serpent, mere horse or lion, mere sheep or tiger, to the end of the chapter: that is, I should have remained just what my spiritual association made me, a living animal without true freedom or selfhood, without any Divine quickening, and consequently without any power to rise above the lot of my nature.

This is what the good book pronounces a lonesome condition, in which obviously it is not good for man to continue, because while it lasts he is, though apparently conjoined with God, in reality disjoined. For the human mind is here presented to us as yet only in a celestial condition, that is, in its infantile beginnings ; and although this condition is one of seeming innocence, yet the least reflection shews that the innocence is more apparent than real, more superficial than solid, being of that sort which characterizes lambs and doves rather than humanity. It is destitute of the human element, which is spontaneity, and hence will not keep. It is the innocence which flows into us from spiritual association, which we inherit from our past ancestry, and is consequently incapable of constituting our true individuality. As to my natural or inherited genius, I may be as guileless and harmless as all the lambs and doves extant ; yet nothing shall hinder me spiritually or individually becoming perhaps as ravenous as the wolf, as cunning as the fox, as lordly as the lion, as venomous as the serpent, simply because this guilelessness and harmlessness have no root in my proper spontaneity, that is in my God-given selfhood, but are reflected upon me from chance spiritual association. Swedenborg was never able to discover any angelic existence which was spontaneously good, or good of itself. On the contrary, he found that the highest angel, when dissociated from his fellows, and brought into contact with lower influences, became as lascivious and vile as any devil. In short, he discovered that the angelic goodness was invariably contingent upon harmonic association, or depended upon a rigorous previous elimination of evil ; and hence was anything but spontaneous. Evidently, then, this celestial goodness would be a very poor rest for the Divine creation. Creation would in that case be like an air-built house without any foundation in the earth. And yet our Adamic side, our merely natural selfhood, our constitutional life, so to speak, has no profounder source than this. Man is naturally only what he is made by spiritual association. Every affection he feels, every thought he experiences, every breath he draws in fact, is an influx from spiritual companies in which all unconsciously to himself he has been immersed from birth : and consequently if he were wise, he would, as Swedenborg says, appropriate neither his good nor his evil to himself, but dwell incessantly in a region of Divine life and peace, undisturbed by that mean conflict. But this wisdom comes in its own sure time. We will not ask the child to anticipate the man, lest the man himself be spoiled. Adam is but the celestial infant unweaned as yet from the maternal bosom, or without real selfhood : let us wait for the second and sublimer Adam, for the adult and ripened manhood of the race, to see this selfhood triumphantly asserted. Handle me and see, said the Christ, for a spirit HAS NOT FLESH AND BONES as ye see me have. In symbolic literature, "flesh and bones" signify the natural life or selfhood, what Swedenborg calls the external man. Angels and spirits are thinly clad in this particular, because, inasmuch as their life is a perpetual derivation or influx to them from parent societies, they have manifestly no independent selfhood, no life in themselves. They have only the appearance of such life, never the reality. They do good, says Swedenborg, only AS OF themselves, never really OF themselves. For the creature is really, by the very terms of the proposition, without selfhood, except what he derives from the Lord. Every thing short of this is a mere flatulent fallacy, "a mere dead nothing," says Swedenborg, "though it seem to us so real and important, yea, our very all." "Natural wisdom," he says elsewhere, "laughs when it is told that man has no selfhood, his selfhood being only a fallacious semblance: and it laughs still harder when it is told, that the more man believes in such apparent possession, the less selfhood he really has, while the angels on the other hand, who don't believe in it at all, and reject it from them, are filled with a most real selfhood from the Lord."—A. C., 2654. See also the Divine Providence, 308-9. Thus even the show or semblance of life we have by nature in ourselves, attributes itself to the DIVINE NATURAL man. It is only because the Divine Love is capable of eventually endowing us with real freedom, with real selfhood, that this seeming freedom or selfhood becomes previously practicable. In a word, if we had not been ultimately destined for a spontaneous life or righteousness, that is to say, for a life and righteousness which shall inhere in ourselves and not be derived to us from without, we should never have exhibited a symptom either of moral or of physical consciousness.

Understand, then, that Adam symbolizes the celestial or rudimentary condition of humanity, the state of infantile innocence and ignorance we are in before the dawn of morality, before we have eaten of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. When Swedenborg conversed with persons of this transparent type, with angels corresponding to this germinal and tenderly beautiful aspect of humanity, he found them of an exquisitely innocent and docile deportment, attributing neither good nor evil to themselves, and enjoying ineffable peace and felicity in the Lord. But the tendency to selfhood, or the inappeasable desire to be wise from themselves, must have been latent in all their specific genius, since it came out so fully in that of their descendants. These descendants, says Swedenborg, were unwilling to be led of the Lord, or would be wise from themselves: and though they had no conception as we now have of the Divine glorification of human nature, and consequently incurred the condemnation of an unenlightened conscience, still their aspiration was intensely human, betokening more than all things beside the presence and vivacity of the Divine spirit within them; and accordingly selfhood was granted them vivified with all Divine love and wisdom. And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her to the man. And Adam said, This is now BONE OF MY BONES AND FLESH OF MY FLESH,—therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh. To leave one's father and mother, means spiritually, to cease being an internal man, that is, to cease being dependent upon celestial and spiritual influence. And to cleave to one's wife means spiritually to become enlightened and enlivened from oneself, that is, by the operation of the Divine natural humanity. In short, the whole passage means our ceasing to vegetate and beginning to live: it indicates the transition from a merely constitutional and imbecile existence into a life of plenary Divine contentment and power. The woman's being called by the man "bone of bones and flesh of flesh," signifies the intimate dearness and nearness of the selfhood to the human heart, and recalls those profound words of Christ already quoted, a spirit hath not FLESH AND BONES as ye see me have. It is as if He said in other words, "a spirit is utterly void of natural force, or life in himself, and yet I possess this life even after my death in undiminished vigour." This flesh and bones, this divinely vivified natural selfhood, is what we have all been struggling for from the beginning, is what we are all now miserably prey-ing upon ourselves and upon each other for the lack of. What a profound though all unconscious confession of the fact, broke from the bosom of my manly friend Thackeray the other day, when, in one of his lectures on the four Georges, he thus painted the insanity of George the Third. I quote from a newspaper:—

“‘History,’—thus concluded the lecturer, amidst the solemn silence of the audience,—‘presents no sadder picture than that old man, blind and deprived of reason, wandering through his palace, haranguing imaginary parliaments and reviewing ghostly troops. He became utterly deaf too. All sight, all reason, all sound of human voices, all the pleasures of this world of God, were taken from him. Some slight lucid moments he had, in one of which the queen, desiring to see him, entered the room and found him singing a hymn and accompanying himself on the harpsichord; when finished, he kneeled down and prayed aloud for her and for his family, and then for the nation, concluding with a prayer for himself that God would avert his heavy calamity from him; but if not, that He would give him resignation to submit to it. He then burst into tears, and his reason again fled. What preacher need moralize on this story? What words, save the simplest, are requisite to tell it? It is too terrible for tears. The thought of such misery smites me down in submission before the Ruler of kings and men—the Mo- narch supreme over empires and republics—the inscrutable Dispenser of life, death, happiness, victory. Oh, brothers, I said to those who heard me first in America—oh, brothers, speaking the same dear mother-tongue; oh, comrades, enemies no more, let us take a mournful hand together as we stand by this royal corpse, and call a truce to battle. Low he lies to whom the proudest used to kneel once, and who was cast lower than the poorest, whom millions prayed over in vain. Driven off his throne, buffeted by rude hands, with his children in revolt, the darling of his old age killed before him, old Lear hangs over her breathless lips, and calls—Cordelia, Cordelia, stay a little.

Vex not his ghost, O! let him pass, he hates him
That would upon the rack of this rough world
Stretch him out longer.

Hush strife and quarrel over the solemn grave!
Sound, trumpets, a mournful march. Fall, dark curtain, upon his pageant, his pride, his griefs, his awful tragedy!"

"The thought of such misery," says this sincere and tender soul, "smites me to the dust before the awful Ruler of kings and men." What a melting cry of anguish is here! This masterly writer, who sounds at will all the depths of human nature, is no stronger nor wiser at bottom than the rest of us: he too feels life insecure, he too lifts

a pallid face in prayer to God lest some hideous calamity engulf his fairest hopes. Few persons have maintained their natural naïveté and candour so unbronzed by contact with the world, as this great and hearty Thackeray, this huge, yet child-like, man; but if the secret bosom of men were canvassed, there would be none found who does not profoundly sympathize with him. We are all of us without real selfhood, without the selfhood which comes from God alone. We have only the shewy and fallacious one which inflows from the spiritual world, and which is wholly inadequate to guarantee us against calamity. We shiver in every breeze, and stand aghast at every cloud that passes over the sun. When our worthless ships (which we ought to be ashamed of building, which we ought in fact to hang our shipmasters for building) go down at sea, what shrieks we hear from blanched and frenzied lips peopling the melancholy main, perturbing the sombre and sympathetic air, for months afterwards! When our children die, and take back to heaven the brimming innocence which our corrupt manhood feels no use for, and therefore knows not how to shelter; when our friends drop off; when our property exhales; when our reason totters on its throne, and menaces us with a downfall; who then is strong? Who, in fact, if he were left in these cases for a moment to himself, that is, if he were not steadied in his own despite by the mere life of routine and tradition, but would be ready to renounce God and perish? So too our ennui and prevalent disgust of life, which lead so many suffering souls every year to suicide, which drive so many tender and yearning and angel-freighted natures to drink, to gambling, to fierce and ruinous excess of all sorts: what are these things but the tacit avowal (audible enough however, to God!) that we are nothing at all and vanity, that we are absolutely without help in ourselves, and that we can never be blessed and tranquil until God take compassion on us, and conjoin us livingly and immortally with Himself?

This be assured, my friend, is the inmost meaning of human history. To become conjoined with God naturally as well as spiritually—this is the great destiny of man which we are at last on the very verge of realizing, unless some new and sickening imbecility, some new inrush of merely fallacious and sentimental life, set us back again in the direction of the base earthly Adam. I confess I have my fears for a portion of the race when I read of the insanities and inanities of our modern ghost-mongers, American and English. Since the beginning of history the Divine natural humanity has been doing its best to struggle into conscious life: that is to say, a divinely perfect order for the natural mind, for man in nature, has been persistently seeking to come into clear scientific speech and recognition. What has hindered it doing so? Nothing whatever but the overbearing prestige of the so-called spiritual world : nothing whatever but the remorseless tyranny exerted thence over the natural imagination of the race. The influx of that world into nature has always so inflamed our merely natural affections, has bound us so helplessly to our parents and grannies, to our uncles and cousins, has kept up such a perpetual vivification, in other words, of the most narrow and abject natural prejudice in the mind of the race, that human progress has been almost impossible, and would have been quite so, if God had not mercifully limited the sway of priest-hoods, or rather systematically deflected their influence to the cordial fomentation of our distinctively secular ambitions and aspirations. As I have said before, we live under the Iscariot dispensation, for Judas was one of the chosen twelve, and has his inalienable significance in the history of the Christian Church. Thus we find that the inevitable progress of the Church itself has utterly sapped our reverence for the spiritual world, or left it a mere empty tradition : we find that the mass of mankind in Christendom has, through the increasing worldly pomp and affluence of the Church itself, become disinterested, so to speak, in the spiritual world, and are turning themselves with boundless goodwill on every hand to ask rather, what are God's marvels of order and wisdom, of love and mercy, for this despised and neglected natural world. In one word, men are getting thoroughly tired of their old, seeming, merely constitutional and finite life, and with panting sides yearn and pray for one fragrant breath at last of their real, Divine, and infinite one. And the consequence is, that the Divine Love is at length beginning to avouch its redeeming presenee in the earth, beginning to glorify the common natural life, beginning to shew the indiscriminate human selfhood aglow with invention, with skill, with power, with grace, with every Divine faculty in short, and so to commend every man to his brother's unlimited respect and benediction as a temple instinet with Divinity.

In this critical condition of things, when every mountain-top blushes with the splendour of oncoming and incarnate Deity, a set of belated Rip Van Winkles, who have done nothing but snore while others were astir for long centuries, suddenly make the discovery (which no wide-awake person has ever needed to make, so cruelly hampered and oppressed has his proper human force always been by his overwhelming consciousness of the fact) that the spiritual world exists, and exerts an intimate and enormous influence upon nature. Prodigious! Such an opportune discovery too, betraying the very heyday and sabbath of drowsiness, to take place just as the enlightened bulk of Christendom are ripe for the conviction, that nature has her harmonies no less Divine than those of spirit, and that if the soul has hitherto claimed the blind obedience of the body, it has only been because both alike have imperfectly realized their true destiny, or failed to subserve that Divine and perfect life in man, to whose commanding needs they are quite equally subordinate. And after all our sceptical discoverers seem by no means sure of their discovery. The way they run after additional evidence, the fervour with which they receive every reiterated joggle of the mahogany, illustrated erewhile by spirits more ardent, but incalculably less mischievous;* the glee, in

* "It is believed by many," says Swedenborg, "that man may be taught of the Lord by spirits speaking with him: but they who believe and wish this, are not aware that it is connected with danger to their souls. So long as man is in the world he is indeed in the midst of spirits, as to his spirit, but these spirits do not know that they are with man, any more than man knows that he is with them. The reason of this ignorance is, that their immediate conjunction takes place in their affection, whereas they are only mediately conjoined in the sphere of thought, natural thought having only a correspondential relation to spiritual thought, and relationship by correspondence leaves one party completely ignorant of the other [makes one, in fact, the inversion of the other]. But whenever spirits begin to speak with man, they come out of their own spiritual state into man's natural state [that is, out of a correspondential into an actual relation], and then they know that they are with him, and conjoin themselves with the thoughts which flow from his affection, and from those thoughts converse with him. They cannot enter into anything else, without at once separating themselves from man, for the law of spiritual intercourse is, that similar affection conjoins people, and dissimilar disjoins them. Hence the speaking spirit is necessarily in the same principles with the man to whom he speaks, whether such principles be true or false, and hence he is sure to excite those principles, and by the short, with which they hail every trivial proof of a haunted side to our baser nature, of an under-hand and sneaking ghostly interference permitted through the erevices and rat-holes of our still most disorderly natural and assoeiated existence: all this shews, I say, that they are even yet in-

added force of his will strongly to confirm them. From all this it is clear that a man can never speak with, or be otherwise operated upon by, spirits essentially different from himself, so that enthusiasts always come in contact with enthusiastic spirits, fanatics with fanatical ones, heretics of every complexion with heretical ones, and so forth. All spirits speaking with man are precisely what they were when in the world, as I have known by multiplied experiences. And what is ridiculous is, that when a man believes that the Holy Spirit speaks with, or otherwise operates upon, him, the spirit is in the same persuasion and fancies himself the veritable Holy Ghost. This is common with enthusiastic spirits. From these considerations it is evident how dangerous it is to court spiritual intercourse. Man does not know the character of his natural affection, whether it be good or evil, or whether it be conjoined with heaven or hell; and if he be at all conceited of the intelligence which flows from that affection, his familiar spirit will be sure by fanning that intelligence to confirm his particular affection, and so possibly plunge him into irremediable disaster. The Pythonics, &c., &c., were formerly of this sort: but the children of Israel, or the representative church of the Lord, were forbidden to seek spiritual communications under penalty of death." See The Athanasian Creed, 74. See also The Divine Providence, 321. "Those who are instructed by influx as to their beliefs or conduct, are neither instructed by the Lord or any angel, but by some fanatical spirit or other, and are seduced. All really Divine influx takes place by an enlargement of the understanding, growing out of an enlarging love of truth." I recommend these words to the serious regard of every one whose mental tabernacle has begun to be disquieted by rats. See Appendix A.

completely assured, and regard spiritual existence much less in the light of a truth than of a probability. Who can say that minds of this cast will ever be satisfied, even when they go into what they call the "spirit-world:" who can say that even then they will not go about for further evidence and testimony, and, like the sieve of the Danaïdes, never know when they shall have got enough?*

But however all this may be, I want you distinctly to observe that the spiritual world is utterly void of claim to our rational regard, except as ministering to our exclusively finite side, to our purely constitutional endowments, as distinguished from our proper life. It has no direct relation to our life, but only an indirect one through our physical and moral natures, through our natural and social existence. My life is spontaneous and free, flowing from the immediate presence of God in me. No doubt this life demands as a platform, or basis of its own manifestation, my physical and moral existence, just as the upper stories of a house demand an underground foundation: but life is no more to be confounded with its mere subter-

* I count several beloved and admired friends in this movement, who predict excellent results from it. While I rejoice that their own ample and powerful wills shield them individually from the mischiefs which inhere in an undue familiarity with these ghostly Jeremy Diddlers, these spiritual ticket-of-leave men, I all the more abhor and deplore the frequent and fearful disasters which ensue to feebler organizations.

aneous conditions, or with existence, than the drawing-rooms and bed-chambers of a palace are to be confounded with its kitchen and larder. All the wretchedness of our past and present history refers itself in some shape to this shallow and pestilent error. The cleanly and beautiful temple of God in our souls is incessantly overrun with spiritual vermin in consequence; we are daily chased from corner to cupboard, from cellar to garret, by stenches so infernal as to put us to our wits' end for a remedy: and no remedy appears but at once and manfully to learn to separate between existence and life, or what is the same thing, to compel the spiritual world equally with the natural one into the humble harness of use, into the undeviating and eternal subjection of God's life in man. Thus if any nasty spiritual person should contrive to come to us through the reeking chinks of our still unscientific mental sewerage, saying that he has been divinely relegated to a certain charge over our servile and constitutional interests, over our natural affections and intelligence, let us tell him in return that he is a very precious ass to affect a mission of that nature, since all the good we do each other in such connection is strictly contingent upon our being utterly unconscious of it. And if he go on, on the other hand, to allege that he bears any the faintest conceivable relation to our real and immortal parts, or to that life which is alone worth our thought because it alone comes from God, let us greet him with a cachination so hearty and derisive, as shall bid him instantly disperse, nor ever shew his foolish face again within the breezy realm of cockcrow. Understand well that no human being, angelic or diabolic, touches us except circumferentially : never in the regal and transcendent plane of Life, but only in the servile plane of Law. In so far as I am a fixity, that is to all the extent of my relations to nature and society, of my physical and moral existence, I am intimately dependent upon angel and devil. I have neither health of body nor sanity of soul but by a preponderant influx from heaven ; nor have I disease of body and insanity of soul but by a preponderant influx from hell. Thus if I had no commanding life in God, I should be the mere chance puppet of these warring influences, and go on myself to swell the ranks of angel or devil to all eternity, as my own inherited tastes might decide. What I feel bound then by my supreme loyalty to the Divine life to do, is, to shake my cordial fist at both angel and devil, bidding one and the other alike to observe a respectful distance. I will have no private relations with either of them. If between them they can contrive any benefit to my common nature, physical and moral : if by the growing subordination of hell to heaven, and of heaven to the Divine, the ordinary level of our natural and social existence becomes elevated, I no doubt, like every-body else, will prove a grateful participant of that boon: but I will accept no special advantage from either quarter. In fact, I would not give one fig to call all the good that gladdens any heaven my own; nor would it cost me one pang of self-reproach to find myself charged with all the evil that festers in any hell: simply because I am profoundly sure that in both cases alike the possession would be only apparent, not real; that is to say, would attach to me exclusively on the side of my moral or quasi freedom, and not on that of my spontaneous and genuine freedom.*

But it is high time that we got back to our great symbolic starting-point and progenitor—Adam. But as I shall still have much to say in this connection, I shall probably consult your convenience by deferring it to another letter.

Yours truly,

* See Appendix B.

LETTER XVII.

Paris, Jan. 5th, 1857.

MY DEAR W.,

WE have seen that the truth which inspires all revelation and enlivens all history, is the truth of the Divine vivification of human nature, or of God's essential humanity. God gives life, no doubt, to angels and spirits, but only because angels and spirits are partakers of human nature, because they are germinal or rudimentary men. In short, A TRULY INFINITE GOODNESS AND WISDOM INFORM AND ANIMATE HUMAN NATURE, AND THAT NATURE ALONE. This truth which only our tardy docility in Divine things, in other words, our infatuated self-conceit, hinders us seeing, is the sole interior meaning of revelation, constitutes the entire spiritual burden of the literal dogma of Christ's glorification or divinity. It is a truth so utterly remote from the unassisted reason of the race, that its clearest and most emphatic enunciation in the Christ, has been incessantly perverted to the damage and degradation of our common humanity. Men have been prompt enough to believe in God as the friend of certain distinguished persons, of certain regenerated or angelic specimens of the race : but it has never been credited that the Divine favour turned in every such case upon the fact, that the persons in question were only more truly men than others, were more, and not less, finished specimens of unalloyed manhood. We have always cheerfully said and sung : “ Yes, we shall doubtless enjoy a Divine beatitude after life’s fitful fever is over, that is, after we too shall have become angels ; but so long as we remain mere men, we have nothing to expect but indifference at the Divine hands.”

Now to what cause are we to attribute this inveterate ignorance and stupidity on our part ? Why obviously to the fact that we are still in our human babyhood, that our characteristic human life—the life we derive exclusively from God—is still almost unbegun, that creation in short is yet unachieved. Our distinctive human life is really an immortal life, is so veritably grand and august as to place its true beginning only where all other things find their ending, namely, in death. It converts death into its own immortal pasturage, turns it into its own prolific and exhaustless womb. For our distinctively human or characteristic life begins, only when the animal and moral life ends, only when our relations to nature and society, to our own body and to our fellow-man, have been reduced to the régime of law. It is only because God is my inmost life, because my proper human force dates from Him instead of being inherent in my physical or social conditions, that I am capable of what no animal is capable of, namely, of conscience or moral power, which is the power of transcending my physical and social constitution, or of reducing nature and society to the service of my individual tastes and attractions. Conscience attests the faculty which man alone possesses of separating himself from his merely finite and constitutional environment, and allying himself with infinite goodness and truth. Every one who has ever experienced a genuine moral afflatus, every one whose conscience has not undergone a hopeless pharisaic twist and sophistication from the existing priestly corruptions of the Divine name, knows that conscience is an invariable minister of death, is a perpetual flaming-sword turning every way to guard the Tree of Life, and will therefore be quite ready to allow that the Divine power alone is competent to sustain him under it. Nothing whatever explains my moral experience, or the operation of conscience in me, but the fact that my life derives immediately from God. He must be intimately present and busy in every distinctively human—that is, really individual—breath I draw, in order to account for my surviving even for a moment the legitimate operation of conscience. For conscience, freely operative, fills my bosom with the pungent and stifling odour of mortality, with the intimate and overwhelming presence of death ; and nothing hinders this death becoming instantly actual as well as sentimental, outward as well as inward, natural as well as spiritual, but a conservative power within my nature deeper than myself, but a living presence within me infinitely more Divine than my present consciousness is ever prepared to ratify. Our life is always deeper than we know, is always more Divine than it seems, and hence we are able to survive degradations and despairs which otherwise must have engulfed us. Why does the animal exhibit an utter dearth of conscience? Why, for example, does he feel no inward monition of death when he robs his fellow of a savory carcass? Because the animal's life is at best but a process of dying, or is essentially mortal : because, in a word, he is individualized only by his nature, and hence is insensible to every motive but those of a mere natural communism, which leaves him empty of all Divine privacy or sanctity. I, on the other hand, being man, am essentially immortal, being quickened or individualized by my nature only in appearance, while in reality I am supernaturally quickened. It is the distinction of man to be individualized by God alone, and hence to realize true being only in dying to his seeming or spurious one. Accordingly when I rob my fellow of his bone, or do him any species of injustice, I am not like the animal, at peace with myself, but am filled on the contrary with a poignant interior anguish which flows down and poisons every spring of natural delight. It saps my most robust life with instant decay, it smites my most ample and clear-shining day into niggard and appalling night. And this simply because a really infinite love and wisdom embed human nature, quicken the human form, and hence qualify me as they qualify no animal for a life commensurate with all Divine perfection. Conscience is the negative attestation of this truth. It is the unripe aspect of the Divine life in humanity; it marks the period of spiritual pregnancy or gestation in us, before the Divine seed has taken appreciable form or come to self-consciousness, and is attended consequently by all those signs of spiritual nausea, distress and anguish, which announce in every sphere the descent of new life.

This, then, is the reason of our prevalent ignorance and stupidity in Divine things. It is because we are still uncreated, so to speak, because we are still but quasi or prospective men in place of real and consummate ones. Our proper life is essentially immortal because it comes from God, but of course it cannot come to consciousness in us so long as we remain spiritually subject to mortality, so long as our bosoms are the abode of all unmanly cowardice and fear, or bring forth only envy, malice, hatred, and every other fruit of death. We are still too generally the abject slaves of nature and convention to recognize our proper human worth, and until we do this we are of course ashamed to affiliate ourselves to the immaculate Goodness. God is the father of freemen not of slaves, and therefore an instinct full of worship keeps us still in cordial unbelief of the Divine name, nor need we expect this unbelief to be softened by anything short of the scientific conception of human destiny, or the oncoming of the Divine NATURAL humanity.

But if all this be true: if to be man be truly to image God and realize all Divine blessedness: you will reasonably inquire of me why the Scriptures are not constructed upon the scientific acknowledgment of the fact? If to be man be all that the creative Love and Wisdom desires in its creature, how comes it, you will ask, that the Scriptures first describe an apparent creation of man, then represent him as falling from that condition, and subsequently proceed to insist upon his regeneration or recreation? If to be man be all that God requires in order eternally to bless us, why do the Scriptures of truth exhibit man in this divided aspect, under the lineaments of a first and second Adam, or as the subject of an old and a new birth? In short, why should the Divine creation imply to the creature's consciousness his own regeneration? The answer is not difficult.

You remember that in one of my earlier Letters, the sixth, or seventh perhaps, if I am not mistaken, I shewed you that revelation exacted both a body and a soul, both a fixed or finite earth and a free boundless heaven. An undefined revelation, since it would be incognizable to the finite or created intelligence, would be no revelation. It would be, like a disembodied soul, an essential absurdity or contradiction. Every revelation addressed by God to the human understanding, must fall within the forms of that understanding, under penalty of defeating itself. Should the understanding be still sensuous and infantile, revelation must clothe itself in strictly corresponding forms, content to reserve its spiritual splendours for the maturer manhood of the race, for those advanced periods of history when reason having become emancipated from the burly and deafening pedagogy of sense, shall reflect the direct voice of God. All this is obvious enough. But the true explanation lies deeper. The true reason for the necessity which revelation is under to obey the laws of the human form, lies in the fact that the Divine life in man is a spontaneous life, is a life in which man being directly vivified by God shall do good of himself, sua sponte, of his own accord, and no longer by self-denial. Such being the case, it is obvious that God must guard the rude and tender beginnings of selfhood or freedom in man with exquisite jealousy, as one guards the apple of his eye, because if these germs should be blighted, or in any way prematurely forced, our true freedom or selfhood would never be realized, and our spontaneous or perfected life accordingly perish before reaching its maturity. Hence the Divine Love dreads nothing so much as the suggesting a suspicion to man that his life is outwardly derived to him, or does not inhere in himself, and it never breathes a whisper accordingly but in tones most consonant to the creature's consciousness. It pays the most sedulous deference to the limits of the finite intelligence, and never reveals itself but under the most rigorously human lineaments. Should the creature, for example, misled by his senses, cherish an erroneous notion of himself, should he instinctively esteem himself the parent source of his own good and evil, and habitually assume therefore the responsibility of his own actions, the letter of revelation must perfectly authenticate this fallacious instinct, nor utter the slightest syllable in derogation of it, under penalty of defeating its own aims. The aim of the Divine Love is to develope in its creature a spontaneous force, a force flowing from a perfect conjunction of infinite and finite, or internal and external; and manifestly the only possible nucleus of this force is the unviolated natural instinct of the creature. Our natural instinct of freedom or selfhood is but the germ or egg of the fully perfected Divine and spontaneous life, and hence unless it were most tenderly regarded by

God, unless its rudest physical beginnings and its subsequent social or moral enlargement, were most zealously fostered and cultivated by God, even as a judicious gardener fosters and cultivates the roots and stem of a plant, it would be destroyed, and with it all the Divine and immortal promise with which it is big.

From the absolute necessity of the case, then, the letter of Divine revelation, or its bodily form, exactly reflects the shape of the finite intelligence. It is never the scientific expression, but only and at best the dim memorial, the remote symbol or picture, of its own interior spirit. It does not express the Divine life in man as that life exists to its own consciousness, but only as it exists unconsciously, or to the eyes of an infirm intelligence. Your image in the looking-glass is not the living expression of yourself, but only its lifeless effigy addressed to an outward eye, the eye of sense. It is not a reflection of your real life, but only of your phenomenal existence. It does not express your conscious and invisible self, but only your unconscious and visible one: not that which really is, but that which appears to outward eyes. Your conscious or real self stands expressed only in your action, in your work, in what you freely effect. It is only your unreal and apparent self which reveals itself in the fleeting image impressed upon the glass. So precisely the Divine life in man finds its living or conscious expression, only in the spontaneous life of man, only in the free play of his taste, of his productive energies, of those marvellous æsthetic aptitudes which constitute what we call genius, or which obey the law of spiritual attraction and disown every outward law. It is only its seeming character, the aspect it bears to a sensuous intelligence, an intelligence inferior to itself, which stands revealed in the visible symbol. We must not only not be surprised therefore, we must intelligently expect, to find the letter of the Divine revelation in flagrant disagreement with its spiritual contents. This disagreement is the conclusive attestation of its reality as a literal Divine revelation. If it had stooped incidentally to discharge any of those pedantic offices upon which our modern critics suspend their acknowledgment of its divinity: if it had undertaken, for example, incidentally to rectify our natural prejudices about the solar system, about the deposit of dew, about the possibility of miracles, and so forth: it might certainly have thus anticipated the growth of the scientific understanding in man, but to have anticipated that development would have been to defeat it. The scientific evolution of the human mind marks its interior expansion, its growing spiritual emancipation from the empire of mere natural prejudice, from the dominion of established authority, routine, or custom. Science, in short, is the Divinely-perfect body of the Divinely-perfect mind of the race: the fixed and indestructible earth at length upon which God's new and permanent heavens are adequately based. If therefore God had thrust any of its truths upon the mind of the race prematurely, or before its advancing interior expansion naturally clothed it with that summer foliage, He would have acted like a silly gardener who in the height of winter decorates his lifeless trees with artificial leaves, and so insults the instinct of truth and fitness in every genuine bosom. If the tree were capable of estimating the husbandman's antics, its life would scarcely revive: for it would say, "This silly man is just as content with seeming fruit as real; he wants not that I should really bear fruit, but only appear to bear it, and hence it is all the same to him whether I am alive or dead." But man is capable of estimating his husbandman's ways, and if therefore he saw God decorating him either with leaves or fruit in anticipation of his natural powers, or which his own intellect and will had not honestly engendered, his profoundest instincts of freedom or selfhood would be instantly undermined, and creation declare itself the empty farce it really was. The scientific mind of the race, in short, is the DIVINE NATURAL mind, is the slow accretion of its interior celestial and spiritual experience, of its varied life of affection and thought; and hence it constitutes the very last result of human history, the crowning achievement of the creative Wisdom. Obviously then it admits only of a symbolic anticipation, or a revelation by means of natural types and shadows such as we have in the OLD and NEW Testament Scriptures.

But here you may ask, "What is the necessity of any revelation at all? Why should mankind have needed a revelation either direct or indirect, either open or symbolic?" I have answered this question by implication in a dozen places, but I am glad of the opportunity to give it a full and explicit solution. I shall proceed to do so in my next Letter.

Yours truly,

LETTER XVIII.

Paris, Jan. 12th, 1857.

MY DEAR W.

YOUR present intellectual demand may be interrogatively expressed thus: Why does the Divine creation involve the necessity of a revelation? This is only asking in other words, what is the scientific force of the logos, or creative WORD: or still again, why has the Church hitherto been the leading feature of human history. I do not profess myself to be an adept, but only a learner, in these sublime fields of inquiry, and I am besides subject to a painful suspicion that I do not concisely report what I clearly enough apprehend: yet as the faintest exhibition of truth is powerful to dislodge error, I have no doubt that I shall be able to satisfy your reasonable demands in some sort, if I am only sustained by your cheerful attention and goodwill.

The entire philosophy of the creative Word or logos, is to be found in the fact that the creative nisus is not physical but purely spiritual: in other words, that creation is never an absolute but strictly a rational—never a wilful but strictly an orderly—procedure on the part of God, involving a due adjustment of ends to means and of both to effects. But all this is too succinct for use without elucidation. Let me rather say then that the reason why creation seems to involve a previous literal revelation of the Divine name, or implies both a letter and a spirit, is that God creates only forms or subjects of life, never life itself. Properly speaking, creation is always a redemptive process, consisting in the bringing life out of death, good out of evil. The Divine creation, in other words, always pre-supposes a field of existence, or consists in God's giving real being to what in itself possesses only a seeming being. It is a logical contradiction to suppose God giving being to what does not even exist, to what does not even appear to be, or to what is destitute of self-consciousness: because this would be tantamount to supposing that He gives being to nothing, which is denying creation. Nothing does not exist. To suppose God giving being to nothing therefore, to what does not exist, to what does not possess even an apparent being, is precisely the same as affirming a realm of non-existence within the universe of being, that is, within the scope of the creative operation. It is to make nothing convertible with something, non-existence equivalent to existence: which is the mere wantonness of absurdity. Only things exist, and nothing has no existence. In denying then that God gives being only to what exists, only to conscious or visible existence, we virtually affirm that He gives being to nothing, and so deny creation altogether. The old orthodox theological formula does indeed say, that God creates all things out of nothing : but this only means that no mere thing is the creative source of any other thing, much less of all other things : or that all sensible existence claims a strictly spiritual and supersensuous being. It by no means professes to be a scientific appreciation and statement of the facts in the case.

No, as Swedenborg shews in his pregnant little treatise on the Divine Love and Wisdom, God creates ex vi termini only forms or subjects of life in which He may dwell as in Himself. He cannot, as we have seen, create being of course ; because "creating" means giving being, just as "making" means giving form, and what arrant nonsense it would be to say that God gives being to being ! From the very necessity of the case He creates or gives being only to subjective forms, that is, to organized or conscious existence.* Thus all true creation implies a subsidiary process of formation or making. And God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, because in it He rested from all the work which He CREATED TO MAKE. That is to say, when the creature is properly made or formed, and not before, the true divinity of his source unequivocally avouches itself: then, and not till then, God's rest or sabbath in him is accomplished, for then first He is able to fill him with the fulness of His immortal innocence, and with the exhaustless power and peace which that innocence conveys.

* "Absolute being" as it is called, is unconscious or inorganic being, is being without form ; and unformed being is non-existent being, for existence means the going forth of substance into form, means, that is to say, a process of formation.

Now we have already seen that the human form or selfhood alone is equal to this great destiny, because it is the only one in which the universal element serves the individual one. In the human form alone the feminine element (meaning by that term whatsoever is internal, spiritual, and private) transcends the masculine (meaning by that term whatsoever is external, natural, and communistic). Thus the human form is essentially spontaneous or free.* Man alone possesses spiritual indivi-

* I use these words synonymously, because we know no positive freedom which is not convertible with spontaneity. Our spontaneous force argues a complete accord between life and existence, between what is real or essential in us and what is merely phenomenal or constitutional, that is to say, between the private individual selfhood and the common universal nature. It springs indeed from the perfect marriage-fusion, or unity, of our spiritual with our natural parts, and is aptly typified by all the wealth of that angelic bond. Thus in spontaneous action the outward or natural individuality freely obeys the inward or spiritual one, finds life and delight in doing so: just as in the angelic marriage the husband is secondary or passive, and the wife priduality, or as it is commonly called, private character, because he alone is able to postpone his natural appetites to his individual attractions, or bend his common instincts to the service of his private tastes. In a word, the distinctively human form is that in which the instinctual or common life serves only as a basis to the æsthetic or individual one. This is what makes it truly image the creative perfection. God is a universal creator: i. e., He gives being to all things, to whatsoever exists. Here you observe that the individual element (God) is primary and controlling, while the universal element (all things) is secondary and derivative. In fact, you observe that the Divine subjectivity involves the universe of existence, and hence disclaims any outward object. Accordingly the only fitting form for the Divine influx and inhabitation, must be one of a like universality, or must combine its constituent elements precisely in this manner, always exhibiting its private spiritual or individual element in a controlling attimary or active. (See Appendix C.) In instinctual action, on the other hand, the masculine, or outward natural, principle dominates the feminine, there being nothing but a natural individuality known to the animal form. In moral action again the case is reversed, for here we see the female or spiritual element coercing the male or natural one into its subjection. Instinctual action characterizes us in so far as we are still subjects of nature, still animals. Its moving spring is necessity. Moral action characterizes in so far as we are still subjects of society. Its moving spring is interest or duty. Spontaneous action characterizes us in so far as we are delivered from the subjection of nature and society by coming into the subjection of God. Its invariable motive is attraction.

tude towards its public, natural and common one. Now in man alone, as we have seen in former Letters, is this requisite imagery fulfilled, for man alone has a universal subjectivity, or finds the realm of sensible existence embraced within the grasp of his proper consciousness. The realm of infinitude or of the not-me, which is the strictly spiritual and objective realm whence descends all our real individuality or character, falls exclusively within man, and is never sensibly but only rationally cognizable. This accordingly makes the eternal distinction of man, that the entire sparkling and melodious universe of sense is but the appanage of his nature, is but the furniture of his proper life, is but the platform of his true individuality, while the source of that life or individuality is itself for ever hidden in the inscrutable splendours of God.

But now we know very well that this true self-consciousness of ours, this distinctively human form in us, is for a long time imprisoned in its mere physical conditions, is long immersed in mere animality. During the immaturity of the scientific intellect, or his rational nonage, man regards himself only as a higher product of nature, only as a superior kind of animal, and never dreams of associating himself spiritually or inwardly with Deity, but only naturally or outwardly.*

* The orthodox theology during this period represents God as an outward person, finited in time and space, every way able and willing to reduce us to an exclusive regimen of kicks and coppers.

His intellectual elevation out of these basenesses is altogether contingent upon the rise of a scientific society or fellowship among men, upon the spread of the sentiment of human unity or brotherhood. So long as this sentiment is purely instinctual, being bounded by the ties of consanguinity or neighbourhood, so long of course society remains without any scientific basis, and does extremely little for human development, does in fact almost nothing towards putting man in free relations with his kind. But society finally outgrows this natural cuticle. Man gradually learns to recognize all men as his brethren or equals, and grows ashamed of loving his father and mother, his neighbour and fellow-countryman, with a love superior to that which he accords to all other men. He learns at last to love his kindred and neighbours no longer for their relative or negative worth, but only for their positive and human worth: no longer for what is their own in them, and therefore separates them from the rest of mankind, but only for what is God's in them, and therefore unites them with all other men. In short, instead of any more loving himself in his friends, he begins to love humanity in them, esteeming those his truest relatives and neighbours who most relate him, or bring him nearest, to universal man. This is that irresistible sentiment of human brotherhood, the outgrowth of our scientific culture, which is the vital source of all our present wide-spread ecclesiastical and political disorganization; and when mankind shall have become sufficiently leavened by it, it will compel society to lift all her members out of the abject and shameful want in which so many of us still grovel, by ensuring us all, without distinction, a comfortable physical subsistence, or a supply of our absolute physical necessities; so permitting us for the first time to draw a veritably free and human breath, and realize our inward alliance with God.

The Pantheistic amendment of the orthodox conception still more hopelessly finites the Deity, by identifying Him with the totality of time and space, or the entire realm of the finite. It is as if you sought to aggrandize your friend by resolving him into his elongated shadow. I confess that if I were driven to choose between Orthodoxy and Pantheism (instead of saying, as I now cordially do, "a plague o' both your houses"), I should greatly prefer for my own worship a being of the utmost orthodox leanness, to one so intolerably stuffed, plethoric, and wheezy as this Pantheistic deity must necessarily be. I have the greatest personal respect for the cultivators of that luxurious creed, but I cannot conceal my persuasion that the soul invincibly repugns the bare conception of a God, of whom stinking fish, addled eggs, and all the other phenomena of corruption, enter necessarily into the constitution, or even into the authentic though partial revelation.

But now observe: so long as this beneficent social destiny of man remains unaccomplished, so long of course our distinctively human force, our true self-consciousness, remains completely submerged by the natural one; all that is manly, free, spontaneous in us being held in abeyance to our basest physical necessities. And equally of course, therefore, the Divine life in man (which is a spontaneous life*) is meanwhile denied any orderly expression, is without any just scientific ultimatum, being obliged to clothe itself in purely figurative drapery, or bury its benignant human meaning under a thick and cumbrous veil of typical rites and ceremonies. This obligation follows from the very definition of spontaneity, and

* The perfect or Divine life in human nature, as we have before seen, is a spontaneous life, or one which interiorates object to subject. Its subject obeys a wholly inward attraction, renounces all outward objectivity or inspiration. This life is perfectly symbolized in the historic incidents of the birth of Christ. He was born of a virgin mother, of a woman who had never known man, being conceived of the Holy Ghost. This virgin mother, bringing forth fruit to the Divine Spirit, signifies our natural selfhood released at last from the despotism of the finite, from the long tyranny of outward want, and quickened exclusively by God, or from within. The virgin is a beatified Eve. She is Eve emancipated from the coarse Adamic thralldom, and accordingly represents the human selfhood no longer servile to the selfish lusts which spring from the penury and compression of nature, but joyfully responsive to the inspirations of its inward freedom, and fruitful therefore of every Divine word and work. The recent outburst of Mariolatry in the Romish communion, stupid enough when viewed as a rational fact, is yet not without a certain scientific interest in a symbolic point of view. It looks as if our interior Divinity, tired of waiting for its true and perfect expression in a beautiful life of man, scientifically redeemed from want and ignorance, or elevated into the universal fellowship of his kind, sought once more to bring itself to human recognition, by inflating the old and deceased symbols.

I beg your pointed attention to the observation, for unless you clearly apprehend the truth I am now enforcing, you will infallibly miss in my judgment the whole distinctive scope of the new economy.

The spontaneous life, as I have just said in the preceding note, is one which interiorates object to subject. That is to say, it is a life which necessarily brings the object of all my action, the object of all my aspiration, the object of all my worship, within the conditions of my own nature. In short, it is a life which exacts the essential humanity of God, which requires that the Deity I aspire to unite myself more and more intimately with, should be an infinite or perfect man, in all the length and breadth, height and depth, of that much misunderstood word. Now such being the true life of man, it must always have existed in a shape proportionate to his consciousness of himself. That is, it must have always existed either in a negative or positive form, either as germ or flower, either as egg or chick. But it does not even yet exist in this latter state. We have not yet attained to our true human consciousness. Individuals here and there dimly discern the Divine seed in them, but the mass of mankind seem utterly destitute of spiritual quickening. Priest-ridden and police-ridden, amidst all God's overwhelming bounties they nourish only the furtive courage of mice, and under the kindling sunshine of truth contentedly maintain the darkened intelligence of owls and bats. It follows, then, that our true life must have hitherto existed only in a germinal or rudimentary form, only in the form of an egg, as it were, out of which in the fulness of time should be hatched the consummate vital reality. And this germ of the perfect life—this rudimental embodiment of it—this sheltering and succulent egg, so to speak—has always been furnished by what we call revelation, or simply religion, or still more simply the Church as distinguished from the State. Some purely spiritual revelation of the Divine name in the individual soul, and failing that, some merely ritual and symbolic attestation of it, appears to have been as much a preliminary necessity of our perfected consciousness, as the egg is a preliminary necessity of the chicken, which is for a long time unconsciously housed within its frail transparent walls.

I say a “necessity,” and this necessity will be obvious to you when you consider the true scope and meaning of our perfected life, when you consider what is inseparably implied in it. The form of the Divine or perfect life in man, is that of spontaneity or freedom, because it is a life which is developed exclusively from within to without, and never from without to within. This is the distinctively human form of life, at all times and under all circumstances, whether man knows it or whether he is ignorant of it, and it invariably brings forth fruit precisely apposite to such knowledge or such ignorance. But man's first consciousness is natural, and afterwards spiritual: that is to say, he feels his common or associated existence before he feels his individual or private one. Of course therefore both these forms of consciousness, both his natural and spiritual form, must reflect the true law of his life, which is freedom or spontaneity. His natural selfhood, his common or associated existence, no less than his individual or private one, must in its own manner reflect the human form of life, must image the great controlling law of freedom or spontaneity. Otherwise his unity of consciousness, his sense of personal identity, would lapse, inasmuch as there could be no basis of continuity between his natural and spiritual existence. In short, the true and Divine life of man, the life of spontaneity, must shape his natural development as well as his spiritual one into conformity with itself: that is to say, must subject the mind of man in nature to a strictly historic evolution, to such an evolution as makes its highest spiritual or individual culture to be nothing more than the strict efflorescence of natural or universal germs. Such is the idea of History. It means efflorescence. It means the continuity of an identical germ through root and branch, through stalk and leaf, to fruit: the procession of life from a hidden or invisible seed to a gorgeous and kingly flower fit to illustrate the sunlight. In fine, it means the growth of selfhood.

But you have enough now to think of 'till the next Letter.

Yours truly,

_____.

LETTER XIX.

Paris, Jan. 20th, 1857.

MY DEAR W.,

You complain of my last Letter as insufficient. It could not very well be otherwise, seeing that I had not bargained to send you a volume of well-digested metaphysics, but only a friendly and suggestive Letter. Let me endeavour now to resume the same theme in a form somewhat more expansive.

You know that ninety-nine persons out of a hundred (and this is speaking with exemplary moderation) envisage creation as a question of time and space—as, at most, a series of sensible facts or incidents, like the American Revolution—and as essentially involving therefore no considerations beyond the ordinary collation and discrimination of evidence. The mass of people believe that creation took place “once upon a time,” somewhere in Asia probably, and was complete on the instant by an exertion of physical energy on the part of the Creator. They suppose that some six thousand years ago, more or less, man was effectively created, and that his entire subsequent history consequently has been little better than a vigorous and unaccountable kicking up of his heels in his Creator's face. The abject childishness of this conception fails to strike them, only because the application of reason to sacred subjects has been so effectually discouraged by the clergy, that our popular intellectual stomach has grown indurated and ostrich-like,—stowing away all manner of innutritious corkscrews, jack-knives, and rusty nails, which may be presented to it by its lawful purveyors, as if they were so much reasonable and delectable Christian diet. Indeed, if you commit yourself to the orthodox conception of the Divine name, you have no right to denounce such a diet as unreasonable. A faith full of revolting difficulties is a logical necessity of the orthodox conscience. It prefers such a faith to one from which all rational contradiction has been studiously eliminated. For, having no strictly human conception of God, having only the personal conception which allows Him to be (at least in all practical regards) a supremely wilful arbitrary and disorderly being, intent upon forcing all things into his allegiance and crushing what cannot be so forced, the orthodox worshipper can of course conceive no homage half so propitiatory toward this terrible power, can contrive no flattery half so subtle, as that which lies in pain and anguish of body and mind voluntarily incurred for its sake.

Regarded from any such point of view, creation incontinently tumbles into a rational absurdity or contradiction, driving us to infidelity and atheism as to a plain intellectual obligation, as to the only bed capable of refreshing the weary harassed soul. For, as Swedenborg declares, so long as we regard creation as a mere physical event, or as a phenomenon of space and time, we fail to discern it altogether: and what we altogether fail to discern by the understanding, we certainly cannot admit to be true. The truth is indeed exactly opposite. Creation is never a mere physical performance on the part of God, or an event in time and space, else hounds and hares, cats and rats, spiders and flies were as authentic creatures of God as man himself. On the contrary, it is a purely spiritual process, falling wholly within the sphere of consciousness, that is within the realm of affection and thought; or what is the same thing, depending for its truth upon the evolution of the human form, which is the sole spiritual form known to the universe. It is not possible for God to create, or give being to, hounds and hares, cats and rats, spiders and flies, because these things are utterly devoid of spiritual consciousness. They are strictly animal forms, in which the feminine or individual element is completely controlled by the masculine or universal one; and God cannot possibly dwell in, or give being to, forms so remote from His own image, so incapable of free or spontaneous action. To suppose Him inhabiting such forms would be, analogically, to deny His strict objectivity to the universal consciousness, and affirm in lieu thereof His strict subjectivity: would be, in plain English, equivalent to denying that all things were subject to God, by making God subject to all things. He creates only man, who is above all things a spiritual form, a form of spontaneity or freedom exactly proportionate as we have seen to the Divine form, because in him the individual or feminine element is internal and superior, while the universal or masculine one is external and inferior. Only in such a form may God "dwell," to use Swedenborg's phrase, "as in Himself." He truly vivifies only the virgin selfhood, the selfhood which has been released from the bondage of the finite, or from all physical and social compression, and obeys the sole voice of attraction, the inspiration of what we call ideas, meaning thereby infinite or supersensuous good. When my individuality transcends its wonted physical and moral anchorage, when it soars away from the servile earth of necessity and duty into the clear majestic heavens of spontaneity or freedom, it then obeys its essential spirituality, it then becomes feelingly immortal, I then feel the interior and inseparable Divinity of my source, and for the first time taste the rapture of deathless conjunction with infinite goodness, truth and power. What does the hare know of this experience? or the cat, or the spider? Simply nothing: because they are all alike spiritually incompetent, being all alike void of spiritual consciousness, all alike incapable of transcending the natural plane, and allying themselves with infinitude. I am capable as man of postponing appearances to realities, or of preferring an infinite good to a finite one. I am capable of hating father and mother, brother and sister, wife and child, lover and friend, home and country, in pursuit of an interior ideal object, or whenever these base actualities claim to separate me from that infinite Divine reality which is the inmost life of my life, the inextinguishable bliss of all my being. But the hound will never know a superior inspiration to that which his nature devolves upon him, as it devolved equally upon all his forefathers; nor the spider ever conceive any bliss comparable with that of fly-catching, which has descended to it from a lineage so bloodstained and immemorial, as to make your ruddiest English pedigrees look pale and cheap and modern in the comparison.*

* No English nobleman can possibly be as thoroughbred as the rat which burrows in his own ancestral walls; because, let him do what he will traditionally to paralyze the human or spiritual force in him, his bare natural form perpetually prevents his lapsing into animality, by itself allying him with God, so forbidding him to remain the mere child of his father. The nobleman of to-day, whatever be his private vices, is vastly nearer the human type than the nobleman of five centuries ago, simply because

So far then from looking at creation as a Divine improvisation, as at best a mere initiatory incident of history, we are bound to turn the tables and look upon history itself as a mere initiatory incident of creation. If you posit creation as a physical event, as an event of time and space; if you reduce it in short to the dimensions of nature; it is still most incomplete, and all our past history with its lively disputes of Atheist and Deist, of believer and sceptic, is but the flagrant witness of this incompleteness. Who can imagine scepticism existing in the presence of a really Divine creation? In view of a creature visibly vivified by infinite Love, who can conceive of belief as driven to suspend itself upon a laborious balance of probabilities? Our historic experience in fact is nothing his very nature itself is progressive, while the animal nature is not. For man's natural form being itself spiritual, is incessantly created, vivified, quickened, inhabited by the Divine, and hence is essentially progressive. On the other hand the rat of to-day exhibits not a whit of natural advance upon his antediluvian progenitor, nor ever will, simply because he is a rat, and therefore divinely uninhabited or uncreated and consequently unprogressive. Spiritually or interiorly viewed, the whole pretension of an hereditary aristocracy is to animalize the human soul, or dissociate man from his divine original, by making him a creature of bloods: than which there can be no profounder blasphemy. This is the secret of those apparently dying throes with which all Christendom is now politically agape and aghast. We are at a crisis in the life of humanity, one of those periods in which man is providentially summoned to shed his old skin, and put on a new one, more pliant to the behests of his inward and essential freedom.

but our gradual approximation to human consciousness, and to the consequent consciousness of ourselves as Divinely created. It marks nothing but the endless interval which separates the highest animal form from the lowest human one. We have indeed no business to look upon human history as an accident, as a something supervening upon our creation, as a direction impressed upon us by some power extraneous to our nature. On the contrary it is a most strict incident of our creation, being nothing more nor less than the ceaseless effort of our essential Divinity to give itself adequate formal utterance or embodiment. God is essential man, and human history is but the gradual adaptation of this superb spiritual truth to the natural imagination of the race. All its sacredest incidents accordingly, far from denoting any outside interference with our nature, are the strict outgrowth and efflorescence of august interior powers. Thus what we call a Divine revelation, what we call religion, or the Church, is never an arbitrary external imposition upon the human mind, but on the contrary is always a normal though fruitless effort of our interior Divinity worthily to assert itself in the plane of the senses, or to attain to scientific recognition. It is in every case the Divine or spontaneous life of man seeking to secure itself a representative or figurative projection, so long as it is denied a living or conscious one. In short, history, strictly speaking, is our process of FORMATION. It is the untiring effort which the creative Love makes to bring us up to the human form, to develop in us spontaneous life, to endow us with a selfhood adequate to image its own perfection, and therefore adequate to its own indwelling: and all its successive stages mark only so many successful crises of that effort.

Let us then boldly reverse our point of view. Let us cease to regard creation as an historical incident, as an event in time and space, by learning to regard history itself, or all the events of time and space, as mere incidents of creation. History, I repeat, means nothing else than the evolution of that distinctive human form which belongs to us as veritable creatures of God, as beings vivified by a really infinite breath, by a really perfect power. It is the gradual vindication of a Divine NATURAL humanity. It is in a word our needful natural formation in the Divine image. The fundamental import of Christianity, the fundamental import of all authentic Divine revelation, is, that we need to undergo a natural formation in the Divine image in order to our spiritual creation; that our spiritual or individual creation by God really exacts for its own permanent basis our natural regeneration. The religious idea, separated from the caricatures of superstition, implies, that it is incumbent upon the Divine bounty to give us natural selfhood quite as much as spiritual selfhood; that unless we first bear a common or associated likeness to the Divine, we shall be destitute of a private or individual likeness. The ground of this exaction lies no doubt in the great law so often cited already, that God creates only subjective or spiritual existence: but you will not be prepared to do justice to this law, or accurately to comprehend its bearings, so long as you cherish vague and obscure conceptions of what is meant by creating. Let us manfully free ourselves of the stifling traditional nonsense on this subject, and then we shall perfectly understand why we require to be naturally as well as spiritually fashioned in the Divine image, or what is the same thing, why a Divinely-given natural form is an indispensable preliminary basis to our Divinely-given spiritual being. And, understanding this, we shall have an infallible clue to the religious history of the race, which is the veritable history of the human mind, and be able clearly to conceive why that history intimately involves the doctrine of a Divine revelation or incarnation.

Let me beg of you then distinctly to remember that I use the word create with strict scientific accuracy, as always meaning giving being. To create a thing means to give it inward or substantial being; he who creates a thing himself constitutes the substance of that thing: so that the relation between Creator and creature is invariably the relation of object and subject, of internal and external. Creating or giving being is an exactly inverse process to that of making or giving form. When I say that God creates me, I suppose myself already formed or existing; I take my existence for granted, or as inseparably implied in my proposition. Existence is an absolute and indisputable fact, and unless we had this preliminary basis of sensible experience, we should be utterly void of supersensuous experience of every sort, whether belief, or hope, or aspiration. Accordingly in alleging my creation by God I do not refer to any mere fact of existence, to any sensible operation of God, but wholly to a spiritual and invisible operation; one which utterly transcends the realm of time and space, because it falls altogether within that of affection and thought. In other words, in alleging my creation, I do not project myself back in imagination to some period more or less remote, when an exertion of voluntary energy on God's part resulted in my physical genesis or formation—resulted in giving me existence. Far from it. I take my physical formation or existence pro confesso, as an indispensable platform of the creation which I allege. For I say that God creates me, and obviously by me I mean my human form, my phenomenal existence, my conscious personality. It would be absurd of course to allege any abstract creative energy on God's part, to say for example that He creates what has no existence, or what is unconscious and invisible: because, as we have already seen, that would be only saying in a round about way that He creates nothing, or that He is no creator. We can never conceive of creation except as proceeding on the basis of some existing selfhood, as involving some subsidiary sphere of formation, as predicable in short of certain conscious or visible existences. By saying that they are created existences, we do not mean to allege any physical fact whatever concerning them, but on the contrary a purely metaphysical fact, which is, that their being is not identical with their visible form or existence, or, what is the same thing, that they as subjects involve a far profounder objectivity than that of nature. And by saying that God creates them, we mean that He who is infinite Love and wisdom constitutes their spiritual and invisible being: that He stands to them in the eternal relation of inward genetic source or object, and they to Him in the eternal relation of outward derivative stream or subject.

You may doubtless ejaculate a ready Amen to all this, by way of inducing me to resume my initial proposition, which is: that God creates only spiritual forms, gives being only to subjective existence: but I feel so cordially disposed to disabuse your excellent understanding of certain sensuous fallacies and prejudices engendered by the Old Theology, that I cannot forbear to solicit your indulgent attention a few moments longer. I want you perfectly to comprehend both what is included in, and what is excluded from, the rational or scientific conception of creation.

Let me distinctly say then, that the technical infidel is completely justified in denying creation, so long as you represent it as implying an outward exertion of Divine power, as meaning a physical operation of God. The letter of revelation no doubt represents creation in this guise, that is, as a simple projection in time and space, as a strictly impromptu proceeding on God's part, involving nothing more than a new determination of His will, and the consequent utterance of an authoritative fiat. But all this is a purely symbolical or pictorial statement of the truth, without the slightest value as history. If indeed you view it as literal history, it becomes at once downright puerility and nonsense, since it represents God as creating mere natural existence, or as being simply what is termed "the author of nature," which is totally to degrade His name, and render it the inevitable butt of the flimsiest sentimental devotion, the tattered target of the mildest Unitarian arehery. Natural existence is absolute existence, being that in which substance and form are identical. Nature means the identity of substance and form, of being and seeming. The stone for example, the tree, the horse, is exactly what it seems to your eye. Its being is a pure seeming, is wholly phenomenal, as the philosophers say. There is no spiritual stone, nor horse, nor tree, lying back of and animating the apparent one. The sensible form before you perfectly embodies its own being or substance, so that every stone, tree, and horse of the specific family in question will repeat the same monotonous story over again till time and space shall be no more. You can't imagine a stone or tree, or horse, out of relation to time and space, that is as having any purely subjective or spiritual existence by virtue of its inward commerce with infinite goodness and truth. You can only conceive of them as natural existences, thus as essentially finite and perishable. Observe then that natural existence is purely phenomenal existence, being destitute of internal or individual being and hence out of all immediate relation to God. Yet this is the prevalent conception of creation, the only conception tolerated by the carnal or superstitious mind. And what is very melancholy, the clergy as a body do their best to confirm and aggravate our natural hallucinations on this and every subject. They are wont, as a general thing, to attribute to God the dreariest and most tedious existence imaginable, by diffusing His infinitude over the wilderness of space, and trickling His eternity through the endless succession of minutes which make up time; and then they represent Him as suddenly resolving to variegate this barren infinitude—to diversify this monotonous eternity—by summoning into life certain absolute or physical forms, which shall henceforth be and exist by virtue of that momentary fiat. In short the ecclesiastical intellect all the world over has the inveterate habit of confounding being with form, creating with making, reality with semblance. It supposes that every thing really is which appears to be : or that things have being by virtue of their form. If for instance you should consult the Pope of Rome or the Archbishop of Canterbury, they would never betray the slightest distrust of their official existence being a Divine reality. They have not the least suspicion that the higher powers are blessedly ignorant of all the conventional dignities of the earth ; they have never imagined that all those distinctions, official and personal, which make up so often our best knowledge, and give many an empty head among us the reputation of wisdom, are sheer vacancy to the celestial mind, raying out darkness, not light ; and if you should hint your own suspicion of the truth, they would cordially unite in proclaiming you an infidel, and bid you begone as a tiresome revolutionary bore.*

* I feel no positive admiration for the revolutionary forces which are now enthroned in France, and only waiting to be effectually enthroned over the rest of the European continent ; because I see that they are mere Providential tools employed to work out far diviner ends than they themselves dream of. But when one reflects upon the crowned imbecilities which actually rule over men, sacerdotally and secularly : when one considers the fearful distance which separates the conventionally upper classes from the lower ; their utter aloofness from the common loves, the common wants, the common hopes of man ; their luxurious self-indulgence ; their unrighteous social privileges, and the inevitable pride and arrogance engendered by such privileges ; their stolid opposition to popular elevation ; their hardened indifference to the

But there is no need of troubling Pope or Archbishop with these inquiries, especially as they have already trouble enough on their hands, I dare say. Suppose the question put to you, John Doe, and to me, Richard Roe: "if the visible selfhood we are each of us born to, be indeed the vital reality which it seems to us to be:" we should unhesitatingly answer, Yes. You have an undisturbed conviction that you are personally known to God, that your luxuriant locks, your dark eyes, your tint embrowned by sun and air, are perfectly familiar to the Divine eye. And I for my part have never questioned that the Divine mind was as cognizant of my visible limitations (short stature, obese figure, fair complexion, flaxen wig, and so forth) as I myself am. Yet this is a sheer mistake. Swedenborg, who had a great eye for realities as discriminated from mere appearances, voice of God's great minister, science; their flippant contempt of every force but brute force, and their inveterate estimate of humanity as an essentially brute existence, never to be regulated from within, or Divinely, but only from without, or diabolically: then Louis Napoleon, Mazzini, and all the rest, become irresistibly precious and sweet to my heart, even as terriers and weasels are precious to the agriculturist long vexed by predatory and fugacious vermin, even as the advent of death's angel is sweet to the soul long imprisoned in a diseased and suffering body. In fact one respects the Revolution very much as one respects Death. It is not in itself a Divine presence any more than the rotten and odious règime which it has displaced; but it constitutes the only door which our double-dyed stupidity and unbelief will ever leave open to the entrance of the Divine kingdom on earth.

could never find a vestige "of the old familiar faces" beyond the grave. The phenomenal selfhood was fatally transfixed and dissipated by the first contact of trans-sepulchral light. He knew many persons of a very conspicuous conventional make, heroes and saints, statesmen and clergymen, abounding in learning and piety; but when he saw them illumined by celestial light, he frequently found them full of rapacity cruelty and excess of all sorts, and degraded to the most menial positions. And so, on the other hand, he not unfrequently found persons, who on earth and to their own consciousness were destitute of every claim to sanctity, who lived in affluence and luxury, who frequented theatres, who loved jocose conversation, who had in short no properly ascetic fibre in their composition—mere unbaptized Turks and Pagans very often in fact—enjoying an intimate commerce with the angels, and heartily allied with all Divine perfection.

All this (and very much more) is true, I say, simply because the phenomenal is never the real, because what appears never is. The sensible world is purely formal, not essential: it is, and ever will be, the realm of shadow, not of substance; of seeming, not of being. It is not the theatre of the Divine creation, but of the Divine formation exclusively, being, to use Swedenborg's phrase, a sphere of effects not of ends. In short, Nature is a purely experimental world, and experience is a first-rate mother, but a most incompetent father. Experience incarnates our wisdom, or gives it outward body: it does not vitalize it or give it inward and rational soul as well. In all procreative action the father is generative, the mother simply prolific or productive: the former gives life or soul, the latter existence or body: the one is creative, the other formative. And this diversity of function is but an image of the universal spiritual truth, that experience (or our natural memory) serves only as a ground or matrix, only as a warm mother-earth, in which to inseminate certain formal traditions, which are the mere husks of truth, inherited from the past, while God alone (or Infinite Love within the soul) constitutes the stainless overarching heavens by whose genial beams these rude and lifeless husks become quickened into every form of living wisdom. We know that every seed must die in order to bring forth fruit. All food must be dissolved before it can be assimilated, before it can make flesh. Now these natural facts are but the shadows of spiritual things. All the literal dogmas we receive into the memory, which is the mental stomach, are of no more promise in a spiritual point of view, than so many stones taken into the natural stomach would be in a hygienic point of view. They give us hope of spiritual increase only in so far as they undergo intellectual levigation or maceration, only in so far as they become converted into that rich rational chyme and chyle whose white depths nourish and embosom the immortal pillars of the soul.* Understand then that Nature is the realm, not of wisdom, but of that experience which is the indispensable soil of wisdom. It is the sphere not of soul, but of that needful preliminary bodily organization without which the soul itself would never come to consciousness. God cannot directly create natural things therefore, because these things, being fixed or absolute, forbid that interior expansion, that perfect individual freedom, which is the inseparable heritage of His creatures, and which alone conjoins them with Him. The horse,

* This is what makes mere professional religionists so tiresome. For having not merely the ordinary human but also a distinctly private or personal end in the maintenance of our traditional creeds, they sedulously guard them from all intellectual fecundation, from all rational trituration and fermentation, and hence perpetually suggest to the imagination the painful similitude of people in a colic. They present the same contrast to our ordinary unconscious and placid acquaintance, that the shop of a seedsman and florist presents to a blooming and beautiful garden. In the professional religionist, the memory is sure to grow plethoric at the expense of the reason, just as we often see a man cultivating a portentous abdomen to the serious neglect and discredit of his brain : and intercourse is never at its just human pitch, until it is above all things rational. When our intercourse is one of cant, being vitalized only by the memory ; when, in other words, my friend and I meet only to parade and compare our mutual wealth in current orthodox coin, the image we project upon the spiritual sense is that of two foolish persons diligently rubbing their stomachs together, or belching in each other's face, in order to inflame a reciprocal good understanding.

the lily, and the diamond, are beautiful natural existences, but how impossible to fancy them in any relation to God, simply because though they have each a marked natural individuality, they are yet all alike destitute of spiritual or real individuality : in other words, because, though they are all subjects of a beautiful existence, they are none of them subjects of life.

This explanation ended, I am now ready to resume my initial proposition, which was, that God creates only subjective or spiritual forms. This follows, almost obviously, from the definition of creating ; for as creating always means, when properly used, the giving being to things, so consequently God can only create or give being to things which are in themselves destitute of being, having at best but a subjective semblance or appearance thereof. He cannot possibly give being to what already has being, since this would be contradictory, but only to what appears, only to what seems to be, that is, to subjective or spiritual existences. I repeat, then, that by the strict necessity of the case, God creates only subjective spiritual forms, in which He resides as in Himself, so and not otherwise communicating life.

Now the condition of subjective or spiritual existence is, that it be vitalized from within, or what is the same thing, that the object it obeys, the ideal it serves, reside strictly within the limits of its own nature. Natural existence is the opposite of this. What the philosophers term "objective" existence, meaning by that word whatsoever sensibly exists, as mineral, vegetable, and animal, is always vitalized from without, that is to say, its objective element is strictly exterior to its subjective one. The mineral exists for the vegetable, the vegetable for the animal, and the animal for man. In short, natural existence is servile existence, finding its proper object or ideal out of the bounds of its own nature. Of course this peculiarity puts the merely natural form of life out of all immediate contiguity to the Divine, by leaving it destitute of internality, of private or spiritual individuality. The horse, for example, who obeys an ideal essentially aloof from his own nature, whose deity in a word is man, is by that fact denuded of spiritual consciousness, of what we call selfhood or character, and hence remains essentially unprogressive or incommensurate with God. He has abundance of physical life, of selfhood or character derived from his natural progenitors, but he has no Divinely-vivified individuality athirst for the fountains of a better life. No sweet radiant Eve grows up in the unconscious depths of his bosom, becoming evermore bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh, and leading him to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, that through the disease and death thus revealed he may rise to the experience of immortal peace and joy. He knows, no doubt, the natural love of the sex, or recognizes the partner his nature provides him : but he has no glimpse of the ravishing amplitude of bliss which is spiritually locked up in the conjugal symbol, and which makes the wife as contradistinguished from the woman, an exquisite shadow of all that is most intimate, ennobling, and enduring in the ineffable commerce of the Divine and human natures. This experience, I repeat, is denied the animal, because the animal form is vitalized from without, because its objective element is strictly exterior to its subjective element, or in other words, because the ideal it promotes, the object it serves, the deity it obeys, is human and not animal, that is to say, does not fall within the grasp of its own nature.

But the exact reverse obtains with regard to man. The human form is vitalized from within exclusively. The objective element in all human activity will be seen on a fair analysis to lie strictly within the subjective one. The ideal which I propose to myself as man, the object I seek to promote in every form of action, in short, the Deity I worship, is always of an intensely human quality, invariably puts on the lineaments of my own nature, and hence my life of necessity becomes evermore beautiful and free, abhorring nothing so much as servility. In a word, man's existence is purely subjective or spiritual, compelling even the infinite Divine perfection into his own natural dimensions before it can win his honest and hearty acknowledgment. What is the inmost meaning and confession of all evil but this? To the inner or instructed sense evil is only the running away of the fish with the line which binds him to his captor, and is but a surer argument of the skill which is bound eventually to bring him to land. Lying, fraud, adultery, murder, covetousness, are only so many temporary diffractions of the pure and stedfast Divine ray operated by our intellectual opacity and indocility; are only so many incessant and stupid crucifixions, wrought by our infatuated carnality and self-conceit upon that Divine and long-suffering Love which underlies and animates our nature. The horse is destitute of morality because, being a purely outward or natural existence, he must for ever remain incapacitated for that spiritual or subjective freedom of which morality is but the shadow. Morality implies a relation of independence, in so far forth as it is predicable, on the part of the subject towards his nature. But the horse is the abject slave of his nature. Every existence indeed below the human exhibits the complete identity of being and seeming, of substance and form, of soul and body. You, on the contrary, as man heartily repugn such identity. You feel so sure of nothing as that your being will always transcend your richest experience of it, or what is the same thing, that your amplest actual must ever fall hopelessly short of your feeblest possible. The real horse is always the visible horse, and no lily has being but that which actually blows in the garden, and fills the worshipping air with its dazzling sheen. But the opulence of man is such, the opulence of God's true creature, that what is visible of him always confesses itself nothing, however glorious, while what is relatively invisible claims to be the only reality. Thus the visible man is never the real one. The man that veritably is never shews himself except by proxy. The true friend must ever despair of disclosing the passionate depths of his friendship, and the genuine lover strives always in vain to interpret himself worthily to his mistress' sense. Though he heap Pelion upon Ossa in the fond effort to storm the flaming heavens of his love, and compress them into appreciable measures, they for ever mock his aching embrace, for ever falling back into the impalpable abysses of the infinite. Such, I say, is the normal state of man. This is his state, when, being emancipated from physical and social thralldom, he stands erect in true human proportions. He is then a purely spiritual or subjective form, made conscious of himself no doubt by the background or basis of his physical and social organization, but utterly incapable of identifying himself with that organization. He instinctively feels himself to be superior to his circumstances, to be dearer to the heart of God than all that calls itself nature and society put together, and in the robust confidence of that intimacy seeks evermore to bring both nature and society into his own unlimited subjection. And manifestly all this is true of our human instinct and experience, only because the human form alone is divinely vivified, only because God does literally create us or give us inward being, while He does not do so to cabbages and horses. He gives them outward being, which is natural existence, and which leaves them destitute of all private individuality, of all spiritual lift above the dead level of sense. But He gives us inward being, which is spiritual existence, and which fills us with a private individuality so pronounced and expansive as eventually to precipitate Nature, much as we drop our garments from about us at night, or rather to transmute her from an all-enveloping and absorbing egg into the very texture and substance of the new consciousness, into the very pith and marrow of the new and diviner manhood.

Of course then the Divine creation rightly viewed, stamps Nature with a deeper significance than she herself is at all aware of. While to her own consciousness she seems absolute and final, she is nevertheless but the seminary or seed-place of the soul, the mere husk and tally, so to speak, of those august interior forces which are for ever shaping the spiritual universe (or the mind of man) into harmony with all Divine perfection. Nature is in short but the perishable body of the imperishable mind of the race, and we fail to see her in this intrinsically subordinate plight, only because we habitually estimate her by the light which she herself supplies, or what is the same thing, because our reason, in place of being served by sense, is actually controlled by it. Revelation itself is bound of course to conform its utterances to this natural necessity; is bound to respect the limits of the sensuous understanding in man, under penalty of forfeiting its true character and becoming degraded into mere information. That is to say, the Divine and eternal truth can never reveal itself to sense except in a symbolic manner, because if it should attempt to assert itself as a fixed or absolute quantity, the human mind would have no chance to grow, being thus authoritatively robbed of its freedom. In other words, the letter of a Divine revelation avouches its authenticity only in so far as it embodies spiritual or universal truth. The general vague impression on this subject no doubt is very different. It is popularly conceived that revelation is not a symbolic unveiling of truth, addressed only to the spiritual understanding of man, but a literal unveiling of it, addressed to his senses. It is sensuously supposed to be a direct and unaccommodated communication on the part of the creator to the creature, leaving the latter no option but to obey. Thus all the gospel facts, so far from being viewed as the normal natural outgrowth and expression of certain Divine operations within the universal soul of man, are supposed to have a purely absolute genesis which discharges them of all strictly human or scientific validity. But this is the mere dotage and delirium of sense. The eternal splendour of the Christian facts lies on the contrary just here, that what seems personal and limitary about them is precisely what adapts them to mask universal truth, or to symbolize the relations of all mankind to God. They have in truth nothing arbitrary about them, but are one with the highest reason, being the outgrowth not of private causes but of universal ones, of causes which are as wide as the universe of being. I hold (perhaps more strenuously than you can at present imagine) that Christ was conceived of the holy Ghost, that he was born of a virgin, that he lived a life of helpless humiliation and infamy in the eyes of the most reputable persons of his age and nation, while at the same time he became inwardly united with the Divine spirit to such a degree as at length to grow exanimate on his finite or maternal side, and find his literal flesh and blood becoming vivified by the infinite Love. But then I cannot conceive of these things being literally true save on one condition, which is, that nature be not the absolute and independent existence she seems; that she be in fact the mere shadow or image of profounder realities, projected upon the field of the sensuous understanding. For if nature be a direct creation of God, if she be an existence fixed by the actual creative fiat, then the pretensions of the Christian revelation are to the last degree absurd : because the Divine creation once actually posited, must ever after prove incapable of amendment, or find itself beyond the need of any officious tinkering. This needs no argument. But if nature be nothing more than the common or ultimate bond and covering of the spiritual world, which is the universal mind of man, just as the skin is the common or ultimate bond and covering of all the diversified kingdoms of the body : why then of course we may regard all natural phenomena only as so many graduated effects from interior spiritual causes, precisely as we regard a blush upon the skin, or a sudden pallor, as an evidence of heightened or depressed vital action. And so doubtless day and night, the succession of the seasons, birth and death, growth and decay, the subordination of mineral to vegetable, of vegetable to animal, and of all to man, are so many natural types, are so many ultimate symbols, of a vast and beneficent spiritual order which is inwardly shaping the universal soul of man, and which will eventually bring about the perfect reciprocal fusion or unity of each with all and all with each. But how to divine this recondite knowledge ! Nature has as little consciousness of man, as the waters have of the sun and stars which irradiate their darkened and tumultuous bosom. Nature herself therefore is incapable of blabbing the secret with which she is fraught, or of proving a revelation of Divine mysteries to the soul, because she is utterly unconscious and incredulous of Divinity. She has no more comprehension of the being she images, than the looking glass has of the human substance whose various phenomenality it reflects. She is a pure surface whose depth or soul is man. No doubt she will faithfully lend herself to the reflection and illustration of his intimate worth, in so far as his own intelligence learns to demand that service of her. But she has no independent power of origination or suggestion. She feels no forewarning of the lustrous use she fulfils, until his advancing self-knowledge imposes it on her. She has no clearly articulate speech which she does not catch up from his commanding accents. In short she knows herself truly only as the echo of his majestic personality, and shrinks from nothing so much as the pretension to lisp even a syllable of original Divine revelation. Revelation descends exclusively from the human consciousness, or from the soul of man to his senses, because man alone being the true creature of God is alone competent to reveal Him. In short the true theatre of revelation is not our mere natural or animal consciousness, but our historic or veritably human consciousness. It demands for its proper platform not merely that humble field of relations which man is under to his own body, and which constitutes what we call his existence, being all comprehended in the fixed quantity denominated Nature : but also and above all that superb field of relations which he is under to his own soul, or to God, and which constitutes what we properly term his life, being all comprehended in that great unfixed quantity which we denominate History.

Only one more letter, and I shall have done.

Yours truly,

LETTER XX.

Paris, Feb. 1st, 1857.

MY DEAR W.,

I do not know how it strikes your intelligence, but it appears to me that I have to some extent indicated in my last Letter the true ground of the difficulty men have in rationally conceiving of the Divine Incarnation. Let us recall for a few moments what has gone before, in order that we may the more clearly take the final step.

We have seen that Christianity abolishes the Pagan conception of Deity, which represents God as an essentially arbitrary, insane, or inhuman, force,—capable at will of any amount of deviltry and destruction,—by revealing Him henceforth as a glorified natural man, as a rightful and permanent denizen of human nature. In other words, the service which Christ rendered humanity—a service to which there has been, and, in the nature of things, can be, nothing similar or second—consists in this: that He furnished by His life of unparalleled self-denial a perfect natural embodiment to the Divine Love: that He shut up the infinite and hitherto inconceivable Divine within the dimensions of the humblest of human bosoms; constraining it thenceforth to know no other activity but that which is supplied by the intelligible forms of human nature, that is to say, compelling it to run henceforth eternally in the familiar mould of our natural passions and appetites. Let there be no obscurity upon my meaning. I say that what Jesus Christ did to entitle Him to our eternal and spontaneous homage, was that He, by His unflinching denial, even unto death, of the popular religion of His nation (a religion which, as to its fond, was fed by every infernal influence, and as to its form, by every celestial one), He, for the first time brought the infinite creative love into perfect harmony with the individual bosom of man—into complete and unobstructed rappport with the finite human form—so that Deity might once for all experimentally know how it felt to be husband and father, lover and friend, ruler and teacher, patriot and citizen, under that base natural inspiration merely; and so knowing, for ever vivify and redeem those finite ties, by the communication of His own infinite substance. I, for example, am a husband and father, am a lover and friend, am a patriot and citizen, and in all these characters exhibit a much less arbitrary aspect than I should have done had I lived in the centuries which preceded Christ. Why? Simply because in those centuries, as Swedenborg shews, the Divine access to man in nature took place by angelic mediation exclusively; and this mediation, being perpetually obstructed and enfeebled by the antagonism of the hells, the consequence was, that every natural tie of man was practically fast becoming a channel of unmixed selfishness and tyranny. We have already seen that the angelic form is incompetent by itself to vindicate the infinitude of the creative power, because it owns no good more decisive than that which flows from the incessant elimination of evil. The angel is an imperfect creature of God, is an incomplete style of man, because he involves a diabolic antipodes. In other words, the heavens are impure in God's sight, and He charges His angels with folly, because they are not spontaneously good, but only voluntarily so: that is to say, because they are good only by the denial of their nature, never by its concurrence. Accordingly the angel must always have proved a most inadequate point of contact between the infinite and finite. The Divine Love must have always felt itself hopelessly straitened in its approximation to the human bosom, by the exigencies of a mediation which never contemplated the reconciliation or co-ordination of self-love with brotherly love, but only its forcible extrusion and suppression.

The whole problem of creation may be summarily formulated thus: the natural man (or man in a state of nature simply, without historic experience) is a form of supreme self-love, and thus presents an exactly opposite aspect to the Divine Love which is incapable of selfish regards: of course then creation must remain an eternal impossibility unless some middle term can be projected capable of reconciling or fusing these inveterate opposites. Now, I say that the angel could not pretend to furnish this requisite middle term, because his entire vitality proceeds not upon the reconciliation of self-love with higher loves, but upon its forcible expulsion, and even, if that were possible, its extinction. But in the bosom of Jesus, exposed through the letter of His national hope to the boundless influx of every selfish lust, and yet persistently subjugating such lust to the inspirations of universal love, the requisite basis of union was at last found, and infinite Wisdom compassed at length a direct and adequate access to the most finite of intelligences. In Christ unfalteringly renouncing His own sacred writings, in so far as they were literal, personal, and Jewish, and accepting them only in their spiritual, universal, or humanitarian scope: in His cheerfully submitting to life-long obloquy for this unprecedented manliness; to the scorn envenomed by disappointment of all that was most decent, devout, and respectable in His nation; to the daily derision of that large class in every community, who, not being devout themselves, yet hope to commend their sneaking souls to heaven's favour by blindly doing the dirty work of the devout, and hastening brutally to finish what these are sometimes fearful even to begin; to the contempt of His own brethren and neighbours; to the constant misconception and unbelief of His own avowed, and forward, and foolish disciples; finally, to death itself—a death from which no element of ferocious cruelty was absent, which, on the contrary, all hell found a truly religious joy in promoting: in this sublime and steadfast soul, I say, the marriage of the Divine and Human was at last perfectly consummated, so that thenceforth the infinite and eternal expansion of our nature became, not merely possible, but most strictly inevitable. Accordingly, ever since that period, husband and father, lover and friend, patriot and citizen, priest and king, have been gradually assuming more human dimensions, have been gradually putting on glorified lineaments; or what is the same thing, the universal heart of man has been learning to despise and disown all absolute sanctities: not merely our threadbare human sanctities, sacerdotal and regal, conjugal and paternal, but also every the most renowned Divine sanctity itself, whose bosom is not the abode of the widest, tenderest, most patient and unswerving human love.

Now what I shewed in my last Letter was, that we deny, or misapprehend this Christian revelation, only because we have the folly to regard space and time as substantial things, as veritably Divine ideas, and to look upon nature consequently rather as the primary than as the intensely ultimate and subordinate field of the Divine operation. Nature is in truth but the basement or culinary story of the Divine edifice; and when we make her primary, or allow her to dominate the house, we of course degrade the drawing and bed-room floors, filling them with sounds and odours fatal to every cultivated sense. Theology and philosophy have done little hitherto but fill the world with this odious din and stench of cookery. Obstinate regarding nature as the final rather than the mediate sphere of the Divine operation, as the real or substantial world instead of the purely formal and phenomenal one, they incessantly drown our rational intelligence in the mire of sense, whence we have now actually no more lively theologic tendency extant than Unitarianism, nor any more lively philosophic one than Pantheism; from both of which the scientific intellect, heedful of its own sanity, is bound heartily to recoil, even if the alternative should be downright scepticism and atheism.* The new theology and philosophy re-

* Confiding in the fallacious dogmatism of sense (that old serpent whose speech is far too subtle and insinuating to be suspected prior to experience), our theologians and philosophers regard being and seeming, truth and fact, reason and experience, as identical, and hence vainly rummage the phenomenal world for an original glimpse of those lustrous Divine footsteps which fall wholly within the soul of man, and of which nature herself is at best but the distant reverberation. Nature is but the echo of the soul, and images verse the spell. They teach us that creation is primarily spiritual and only derivatively natural, thus that the science of nature is rightly comprehended in the higher science of man. "Yes," they say, "cooking is a strict necessity of things, and claims its proper acknowledgment: but it should never be exalted into an end of life. Its sole end is to nourish and prepare the body for the uses of the soul. So also what we call spiritual regeneration is an actual necessity of things, but it is a necessity which belongs wholly to the natural plane of experience. The soul, coerced by the appearances of things, demands it: instructed by realities, disavows it." As long as I am instructed in spiritual things only by sense or appearances, I deem myself an absolute person in God's sight, and look upon all His dealings towards me nothing therefore of the Divine creation and providence which is not primarily impressed by the soul. Your delicious English landscape, for example, palpitating with its rich subserviency to every human need, reflects a far more evangelical lesson in these respects than the hideous jungles of Asia, or our own unsubdued forests and indolent savannas; because the humanized English man has first taught it so to do. Abstract this comfortable Christian English soul, who believes in nothing more soundly than a deity favourable to good cheer, prolific of everlasting cakes and ale, and your peaceful English landscape would have been by this time as ruthless and unchristian as that of Switzerland, which for the most part suggests no thoughts of Divinity but as of some huge, frowning, thunderous, overshadowing, overbearing power, eternally allied with pride and self-will, and essentially untouched by all those blissful human sympathies and charities whose inseparable root is humility.

as having a most special intention, which is an absolute conversion of me from evil to good. But the reality of the case is, that God never acts upon us individually, save by acting at the same time universally, and consequently that what I regard as a change of nature in me, is in reality a separation of spiritual spheres taking place in the universe of the human mind, by which its external principle (self-love, or hell) becomes precipitated, and its internal principle (which is brotherly-love, or heaven) elevated, that so the mind of man in nature may be at length effectually harmonized with all Divine perfection.* I feel in myself, for example, a great horror on account of some sin, real or imaginary, which I have committed; I humble myself before God by whatsoever penitential methods my traditional conscience prescribes, having no shadow of suspicion all the while that God is not literally feeling very angry with me, and even extremely dubious whether or not He will pardon me. Such are the crude and abject data of my natural experience. But hereupon come the theologian and philosopher, not to give me intellectual elevation out of this superstitious lore, but actually to confirm all its teaching, telling me that my experience is an exact

* Of course it is only when self-love claims the primacy of neighbourly love or charity, that it is contrary to Divine order. When it spontaneously defers to the latter, as it does in the scientific sentiment of human society or fellowship, nothing can be half so orderly and beneficent, and we cannot have too much of it.

measure of the real and eternal intercourse between God and the soul. They affirm that He is in truth very much offended with me, just as my still grovelling intelligence proclaims Him to be; that I have in fact committed a grievous sin against Him, and that I only follow the obvious dictates of prudence in aiming to propitiate Him by every customary usage of self-abasement. Such is the help they give my reason, utterly immersing it in sense. It is as if my cook, in a moment of revolutionary frenzy, should transport his batterie de cuisine into my drawing-room, and insist upon henceforth preparing my dinner under my proper nose. For it is really most untrue that God has ever felt, or ever can feel, an emotion of personal approbation or personal disapprobation towards any human being. All this is the mere abject gossip of the kitchen, the mere idle bavardise of cooks and scullions theorizing in their dim subterranean way upon the great solar mystery of life. It is, I say, untrue, because the only conceivable basis of such an emotion to the creative mind would be the creature's independence, and this basis is utterly wanting, being swallowed up in his sheer and ceaseless dependence. Thus, in order that man really do anything either praiseworthy or blameworthy in the Divine sight—in order, in other words, that God Himself should charge us with any of the good or evil which we with obdurate stupidity are for ever charging upon ourselves—it would be necessary for Him first to forget His creative relation to us, and begin to look upon us as essentially underived and independent existences; which is absurd. I perfectly admit that the truth, as reflected in fact, seems directly otherwise. It actually does, and must, seem to the sensuous understanding—the intelligence controlled by sense—that man is an absolute selfhood, that is to say, that his affections and thoughts, far from being an influx from spiritual association, originate in himself exclusively, and hence leave him properly chargeable with all the good and evil issuing from such affections and thoughts. The senses confined to the seeming, cannot help bedevilling in this way our nascent scientific intellect. They recognize only what appears to them, having no glimpse, however faint, of internal realities; and hence they cannot but teach to every one who seeks instruction at their hands, that the actual is the only real, that the spiritual sphere, if any such sphere exist, is only another natural, governed by the same laws, and reproducing the same phenomena. Thus they insinuate that our physical finiteness—our visible insularity in time and space—is a real and eternal truth. They teach me that I am in all real or spiritual respects precisely what I am in natural or seeming ones, that is to say, an utterly disconnected being, regarded by God not as inseparably interwoven and united with my kind, but as distinctly disunited with all other existence, and governed by Him on strictly private and special methods.

Hence it falls out that the dull and sombre walls of our ecclesiastical Zion, and the less sombre but flippant courts of our received philosophy, enclose a far more organized hostility to spiritual Christianity than you will find in conventionally disreputable quarters. The scientific mind, like Pilate, "finds no evil" in the new Divine spirit which is quickening the nations like life from the dead: on the contrary, it dimly feels that the new spirit is full of blessing for itself, and stands ready to ask of it, "What is truth?" But the soi-disant "regenerate" mind, we who think we see—we who are not, like the vulgar herd, "accursed, because they know not the law," but are in fact sanctified by such knowledge, and actually rule the world by its prestige—we feel our unrighteous sway menaced by this tender and loving spirit, and do, as the Jew did of old, everything we can to ensure its endless triumph, by stupidly trying to stifle and crush it. What the Jew did to Christ in the flesh, was only a type, inexpressibly faint, of what we Christians are daily doing to him in the spirit. The Jew had never any power to harm Jesus but by patronizing him. Had he done this, had he espoused the Christian teaching and temper, Christ would have been bound indefinitely to remain the mere Jew He was born, and there is no saying accordingly how long Judaism might have perpetuated itself, no longer indeed as a hurtful, but now as a beneficent, yoke upon the nations, nor consequently how long the Gentile mind might have failed to attain to the scientific sentiment of human equality, which yet is the exclusive basis of the Divine creation. So now, the only hindrance which our existing authorities in Church and State could offer to the new ideas, would be to patronize them, to lend them the furtherance of their adoption: for then the common mind of Christendom, which is very docile to good influences, would be so full of admiration and gratitude towards these old established and now undeniable stewards of God, that a new and worse idolatry, a new and more benumbing servitude of the human mind, would be sure to ensue, and a third advent of the Christ behoove to take place, in order to strike off the fetters forged by the preceding one. The new wine of Protestantism and Democracy—the spirit of an ever-advancing humanity—would seek in that case to confine itself evermore within the old established bottles of Church and State, within the purely symbolic dimensions of priest and king, and by dint of so seeking would be infallibly sure to turn vapid and lifeless, to tumble finally, in fact, into the condition of mere disreputable swipes, only fit to be poured out upon the ground, a scorn and avoidance to men and animals.

This, in literal verity, is the fatal sign about

European Christendom, that it has inherited in Christianity a soul altogether disproportionate to its meagre and inexpansive body. Protestantism is the actual limit of the Church's elasticity,—one strain more, and it snaps into Mormonism or other downright deviltry, which reasonable people will some day be forced to sweep bodily from the earth: and the State can go no further than Democracy without going into visible extinction. In fact, all astute priests and politicians have perceived for years past that Protestantism and Democracy are not so much expansions of the old symbolic institutions of Church and State, as actual disorganizations of them. They mark the old age of those institutions, their decline into the vale of years, preparatory to their final exit from the historic scene. Hence that prevalent movement of unbelief and despair among our upper classes in Church and State, which christens itself Conservatism, and which consists in seeking refuge from the onward Providence that governs the world, by flinging oneself into the arms of the stolidest civil and ecclesiastical despotisms, or in calling upon the mountains and rocks to crush one, by way of shielding one's eyes from the entrance of unwelcome light. How utterly absurd then to suppose our existing Christendom formally competent to embody the Divine spirit in humanity! This spirit seeks the infinite expansion of human nature, seeks to lift the beggar from the dunghill and to set him among princes, simply because he is man, simply because he is a living form or image of God, and hence capable of an immortal conjunction with God. God is blessedly indifferent to the interests of every priesthood and every government under the sun, because He stands in an infinitely nearer attitude to man than these priesthoods and governments can any way conceive of as possible. They have not the slightest conception of God as the Lord, or of a Divine natural humanity, but on the contrary, maintain, under Christian names, the most inveterately Pagan conceptions of the Divine character. Take, for example, any reigning Pope or Emperor, and chase the Divine image through all the windings of his official heart down to its fundamental quality, and you will find it turn out some sheer personal will, some strenuous physical existence, reeling with the possession of mere wanton power, and odious from the exercise of every jealous revengeful and malignant disposition. It is high time that all the world confess themselves atheists with respect to this orthodox deity. It is high time that every disciple of Christ seize this obscene and skulking god of the nations by the beard with one hand, and with the other smite him between the eyes till he fall down and die. The famous M. Proudhon, who snaps his whip louder than any contemporary Frenchman, very much shocked his hypocritical generation a little while since by crying haro upon this Gentile conception of God, or exclaiming against Deity thus viewed as the true curse of human existence. Proudhon's critics, who themselves are fond of snapping their whips in the loudest possible way, seem to have been disheartened by the tremendous eclât of his performance, and are accordingly doing what they can ever since to diminish it, by representing it as a mere insincerity on Proudhon's part—as a mere annonce to the travelling public that here at last was a postillion capable of taking them the shortest possible route to kingdom-come, provided they would only commit themselves to his audacious guidance. I do not personally enjoy the pleasure of M. Proudhon's acquaintance, but I cannot help feeling very serious misgivings as to the truth of this criticism. His judgment strikes me as on the whole a very Christian one. I suppose that Proudhon would be as much disconcerted to be called a Christian as those modest people of whom we read in the Lord's similitude of the kingdom of heaven, as replying to his beaming smile of recognition for services rendered, "But when saw we thee hungry, and fed thee; or thirsty, and gave thee drink?" Nevertheless I regard Proudhon as at bottom, if not a-top—in heart, if not in head—an excellent Christian. His intellect has doubtless been sophisticated to some extent by the dense and blinding obscurity which has traditionally settled down upon the moral problem; but he is obviously a man of the manliest make in heart, and I do not see how any clear-sighted reader of the four gospels, which turn all subsequent revolutionary literature into child's play, can feel justified in denouncing him. Of course I mean the unadulterate gospels, not that bleached and emasculate substitute which, under the name of "evangelical religion," does its weekly best to defame and deface God's image in our souls, through the length and breadth of established Church and State. Evangelical religion as it is called, quasi lucus a non lucendo, quasi mons a non movendo, is such a religion as is fitly piped by the east wind—a religion which cuts across the nerves of the soul like a knife, which chills all the best sympathies of the heart, and ends by freezing its followers stiff in the shallows of their own selfishness. It is of course not of this conventional gospel that I speak, but of the unpervverted gospel of Christ, when I say that every intelligent reader will be slow to condemn Proudhon, because throughout his unskilful books he will yet not fail to discern an unmistakeable flavour of that ancient and incomparable vintage. Clearly, if Christianity makes any distinct pretension, it is to have utterly exhausted natural religion; and natural religion is the only thing with which the scientific intellect of man has any quarrel. Science revolts at the idea of there being any essential limitation of the human faculties, which nevertheless would be inevitable if their vital source could be proved to lay outside of human nature, or inhered as natural religion affirms it to inhere, in a being generically distinct from humanity, and spatially separable from all its individual forms. Science utterly revolts from the conception of a physical or material Deity—a Deity cognizable to sense—and triumphantly careers through the universe of space, to chase from the human mind every vestige of so baleful and disheartening a conception. But it is solely to Christianity that science owes this emancipation. Christianity eternally explodes the naturalistic conception of Deity as a being essentially disproportionate to man, and therefore inaccessible to human intelligence, by identifying Him with conventionally the meanest and humblest of men, with a man who was so genuinely humble and insignificant as actually to feel no personality apart from the interests of universal truth and justice, who had not spirit enough to be angry at the grossest of personal insults, or to resent the cruellest of personal wrongs; but, on the contrary, habitually and patiently endured degradations which any rustic English pedagogue at the present day would be parochially disowned for submitting to for a moment, and which would drive the most sonorous of your English bishops to doubt the Divine existence, if he were even so much as threatened with them. Yet He, adorable man of men, bore unflinchingly on, nor ever ceased to eat the bitter bread of humiliation, until He had made his despised and suffering form the adequate and ample temple of God, and so for ever wedded the infinite Divine perfection to the most familiar motions and appetites of our ordinary human nature. Jesus vindicated his prophetic designation as above all men "a man of sorrows," because in the historic position to which he found himself born, he was exposed on the one side to the unmeasured influx of the Divine Love, and on the other to the equally unmeasured influx of every loathsome and hellish lust of personal aggrandizement. The literal form of Christ's pretension was profoundly diabolic. View his personal pretension as literally true and just, as having an absolute basis, and you can imagine no more flagrant dishonour to the Divine name. To suppose that the universal Father of mankind cared for the Jew one jot more than for the Gentile, and that He cared for one Jew also more than for another, actually intending to give both the former and the latter an endless earthly dominion, was manifestly to blacken the Divine character, and pervert it to the inflammation of every diabolic ambition. And yet this was that literal form of the Jewish hope to which Christ was born. The innocent babe opened his eyes upon mother and father, brother and sister, neighbour and friend, ruler and priest, stupidly agape at the marvels which heralded his birth, and no doubt as his intelligence dawned he lent a naturally complacent ear to the promises of personal advancement and glory they showered upon him. He sucked in the subtlest spiritual poison with every swallow of his mother's milk, and his very religion bound him, so far as human probabilities went, to become an unmitigated devil. I find no trace of any man in history being subject to the temptations that beset this truest of men. I find no trace of any other man who felt himself called upon by the tenderest human love to loathe and disavow the proud and yearning bosom that bore him. I find no other man in history whose profound reverence for infinite goodness and truth drove him to renounce the religion of his fathers, simply because that religion contemplated as its issue his own supreme aggrandizement; and whose profound love to man drove him to renounce every obligation of patriotism, simply because these obligations were plainly coincident with the supremest and subtlest inspirations of his own self-love. No doubt many a man has renounced his traditional creed because it associated him with the obloquy and contempt of his nation, or stood in the way of his personal ambition; and so no doubt many a man has abjured his country, because it disclaimed his title and ability to rule. In short, a thousand men can be found every day who do both of these things from the instinct of self-love. But the eternal peculiarity of the Christian fact is, that Christ did them utterly without the aid of that tremendous lever, actually while it was undermining his force, and subjecting him to ceaseless death. He discredited his paternal gods simply because they were bent upon doing him unlimited honour; and shrank from kindred and countrymen, only because they were intent upon rendering him unparalleled gratitude and benediction. What a mere obseenity every great name in history confesses itself beside this spotless Judean youth, who in the thickest night of time,—unhelped by priest or ruler, by friend or neighbour, by father or mother, by brother or sister, helped, in fact, if we may so consider it, only by the dim expectant sympathy of that hungry rabble of harlots and outcasts who furnished His inglorious retinue, and still further drew upon Him the ferocious scorn of all that was devout, and honourable and powerful in His nation,—yet let in eternal daylight upon the soul, by steadfastly expanding in his private spirit to the dimensions of universal humanity, so bringing, for the first time in history, the finite human bosom into perfect experimental accord with the infinite Divine Love. For my part I am free to declare that I find the conception of any Divinity superior to this radiant human form, inexpressibly treasonable to my own manhood. In fact, I do not hesitate to say that I find the orthodox and popular conception of Deity to be in the comparison a mere odious stench in the nostrils, against which I here indite my exuberant and eternal protest. I shall always cherish the most hearty and cheerful atheism towards every deity but him who has illustrated my own nature with such resplendent power, as to make me feel that man henceforth is the only name of honour, and that any God out of the strictest human proportions, any God with essentially disproportionate aims and ends to man, is an unmixed superfluity and nuisance. In short, I worship the LORD alone, the God-MAN, that peerless and perfect soul whose unswerving innocence and sweetness gathered up the infinite forces of Deity as wheat is gathered up in a sheaf, and for ever linked them with the natural life of man, with every commonest lineament of human nature, so that we are not only authorized henceforth to view the human spirit as inwardly refined from all grossness, which is pride or selfishness, and instinct with universal love and humility, but also to regard the human body itself as the only visible shrine of God, as the destined temple of all lustrous health and beauty, the native home of every chaste, and generous, and magnanimous affection. I take it that every man of sense and feeling will infallibly join in this ennobling worship. I take it that all atheism and scepticism are inwardly fragrant with this devout incense, that to the loving and knowing heart of God they have never been anything else than a negative but most sincere form of the vital worship I here avow. It is, indeed, obvious that Proudhon's manly revolt contemplates only that old Pagan conception of the Godhead which Christianity exhausts, but which nominally Christian priests and kings, for their own private unloving ends, still continue diligently to exploit. Against this lurid power—half-pedagogue, half-policeman, but wholly imbecile in both aspects—I, too, raise my gleeful fist, I lift my scornful foot, I invoke the self-respect of my children, I arouse their generous indignation, I instruct their nascent philanthropy; because I know that he spiritually departed this life long centuries ago, and that it is only his grim unburied corpse which still poisons the popular air.

But now, although I say all this ex animo, do not, I beseech you, regard me as echoing, in any measure, the tedious cant of orthodoxy. If I heartily detest anything it is our existing Christian Judaism (the exact antitype of what the four gospels describe to us in type), with its wrangling regiments of spiritual old-clothesmen diligently dividing the empty garments of Truth among themselves, and hawking the dislocated fragments about as if they were the immortal substance itself. As I have already said, the letter of Christianity constitutes only the seeming or phenomenal aspect of Divine Truth, the semblance which it puts on to a sensuous intelligence, an intelligence not inwardly enlightened. It gives us very much the same unworthy impression of the Divine Truth as a child would form of its father's tenderness who should see that tenderness only in negative exercise, that is, incessantly employed in restraining its natural evils, correcting its fallacious judgments, in short, educating and disciplining it into true human proportions out of its native wilfulness and conceit. In a word, the letter of truth is ipso facto bound to prove a purely negative and symbolic utterance of its substance or spirit. This obligation flows from the great law which makes the natural, in all cases, an inverse expression of the spiritual, or renders the body the bounded home and continent of the boundless soul. My inmost soul, or life, is the infinite God, is perfect goodness and wisdom : but manifestly, unless I had some natural limitations, some finite continent (so to speak) separating me from you and every other body, I should never appropriate this soul, or life, should never be able to feel it and name it me, my self, should be destitute, in a word, of conscious existence. But now this bodily or finite me, which seems the most incontestable of facts, is nevertheless the exact inversion and denial of the infinite truth. It is the imprisonment of the infinite love and wisdom in the purely specious shackles of space and time. The spiritual truth is, that there is but one life, God, and that He alone lives in us : but this would be death to feel, though it is life to believe it ; because if we sensibly felt, as well as rationally believed, that God alone lived, it is obvious that we ourselves should become instantly converted into stocks and stones, into the breathless images of unbreathing men. His superb mercy, above all things, provides therefore that we shall never feel this truth to all eternity, that however we may reflectively think and believe in the premises, it shall yet always sensibly seem to us that life is disunited, is infinitely various, and that we are its absolute proprietors. In short, the Divine Providence perpetually endows us with selfhood, perpetually ensures that we shall feel the finite me to be the most indisputable of realities. But now, if He left us there, mere creatures of sense: if He did not go on to educate us out of our purely physical consciousness by the inspirations of conscience, by developing in us the most passionate social relations, so linking us with parent and friend, lover and neighbour, fellow-countryman and fellow-man, till at last our existence became widened to the dimensions of universal humanity, we should never discern the spiritual truth of the case, but remain under the dominion of mere natural appearances, the victims of the silliest pride and self-complacency, to the end of the chapter.

Now the letter of Revelation bears a precisely analogous relation to its spirit. It furnishes a purely negative index to its own substantial contents, because it is addressed to an unspiritual intelligence, and hence is bound to mask itself in such coarse features as shall be sure to conciliate, or at all events not revolt, that intelligence. But if we hereupon stupidly insist upon confounding letter and spirit, if we insist upon the former not as a purely representative or symbolic, but as a direct and adequate expression of the latter, we shall completely miss the true scope of all Divine revelation, and remain mere spiritual embryos and abortions to all eternity. Spiritual substance, as Swedenborg shews, has nothing in common with time, space, and person. The literal Christian facts in his view constitute neither more nor less than a revelation, within the sphere of sense, of a life in man which profoundly subtends his senses, but which yet could never come to consciousness in him save in the very same way that all super-sensuous ideas come to consciousness, that is, by means of some sensible revelation or imagery, serving as a mould to give them development. All mankind, for example, have the idea of God as the infinitude or perfection of character, of personality. But we could never recognize character or personality in God or man without the mould which our moral experience supplies to that perception. My moral experience tells me that justice is good and injustice is evil, that he who injures his neighbour is an evil man, and he who refrains from injuring him a good man. Now these moral judgments serve simply as a mould or body to our spiritual perceptions, and being as such mould or body the exact inversion of what is moulded or embodied in them, they have obviously no more right to control our spiritual perceptions than an egg has to control the chicken, than the foundation of a house has to control the superstructure, than the kitchen has to control the drawing-room, than the stream has to control the fountain.* But they are, as I have said, an invaluable and indispensable basis and servant of those perceptions. My moral judgments serve, in fact, as a rude but genial mother-earth for the outgrowth of my spiritual in-

* For example, if we should pronounce a man spiritually good simply because he was morally good, or spiritually evil simply because he was morally evil, we should be guilty of gross absurdity, because, in reality, no human being has the slightest un-derived moral power, and it is only un-derived power whose activity confers responsibility. I have no power to injure my neighbour which is not derived to me from hell, or evil association, nor any power to refrain from injuring him which is not derived to me from heaven, or good association; and I am not spiritually chargeable, therefore, with either my moral good or evil, but only naturally chargeable with it. They are both alike a mere natural inheritance, the legacy of my past ancestry. No matter how diligently soever I may work this inheritance, I can do no more at best than associate myself with heaven or hell. I may have all the moral virtue that has ever inflamed human pride, and I shall not be one whit nearer the fountain of life. I may have all the moral infirmity that has ever quickened human despair, and I shall be no whit more remote from it. For that life surrounds human nature, as the waters surround the earth, bathing equally both its contrasted poles; and we might, with precisely the same propriety, deny to the ocean its measured tides, its alternate ebb and flow, as to the Divine life in humanity its perpetual sportive interchange and conjugation of brotherly love and self-love.

telligence. Unless I first felt in myself a moral personality, constituted of the exact equilibrium of good and evil, or heaven and hell, I should lack the fundamental germ of that subsequent spiritual conception of myself, which presents the subjection of evil to good, and of both to the Divine. My true life is a spontaneous one, a life of taste or attraction, a life of freedom, growing out of a complete reconciliation of self-love with brotherly love, the true man never seeking his own ends but by assiduously promoting those of universal man. But clearly I should never be able to grasp or even discern this perfect life, save by the contrast of a previous unreal or enslaved one. If I were not first delivered over by conscience to the experience of death in myself as finitely organized, as vivified by nature and custom, I could never have realized, nor even aspired to realize, that perfect life or righteousness which inheres in myself as Divinely organized, as vivified by infinite love and wisdom. Thus, as I say, my moral experience serves no higher end than to incarnate, or give body to, my spiritual life. In short, the moral man, good and evil, is but the inversion or shadow—is but the rude decaying germ or egg—is but the perishable natural body—of the imperishable spiritual man, who is Divinely or immaculately good, good without the slightest antagonism of evil.

Now, I repeat, that the letter of Revelation observes precisely this same servile relation towards its proper spiritual substance. The letter is but the perishable husk of the imperishable spirit. The literal dogma, for example, of Christ's divinity, is wholly unintelligible in heaven, because, as Swedenborg shews, heavenly thought is never determined to person, but only to the things represented by person. In short, the spiritual contents of the dogma alone are apprehended in heaven, and these are that human nature itself is Divinely vivified, is the adequate and ample abode of perfect love and wisdom. The literal dogma is the needful egg (so to speak), is the indispensable preliminary basis of our subsequent scientific acknowledgment of the exclusive Divinity of our natural origin. Had we not been taught, traditionally, to regard this most humble and abject partaker of our nature as Divine, as perfectly united with infinite power and goodness, spite of his total destitution of whatsoever men are wont to admire in character and manners, of everything that gets itself eulogized, for example, in our great flaunting and mendacious newspapers, our present scientific assurance that human nature itself is Divinely quickened, could never have even germinated. The Christian truth is the sole ground of the difference between the scientific mind of the race and the unscientific mind, between the public conscience, for example, of Christendom and that of Mahommedanism. Take away the traditional Christian dogma from our annals, and the long expansion it has lent to the human faculties, and science would still be groping in the sublimated mud of alchemy and astrology, or perhaps gravely discussing, along with the theologian and philosopher, the momentous question, whether or not God was identical with the contents of a certain sanctified bread-basket.

Remember, then, that the literal dogma is in every case only a needful platform of the super-sensuous truth, bearing a directly inverse relation to its spirit, such as your image in a mirror bears to yourself, or the outside of a glove to its inside. Thus the Divine incarnation, spiritually viewed, is a universal truth, having no more validity to one man's experience than to another's. This transcendent truth was indeed completely revealed in the Christ, but you would not confound the external revelation of a truth with its interior substance, any more than you would confound a negative with its positive, body with soul, or your transient shadow in the looking-glass with your living self. In fact, you are inexorably forbidden to do so, as we have already seen, by the circumstance that the letter of revelation, in virtue of the baseness of the intelligence to which it is addressed, has never any pretension to be worthy of its spiritual contents, except as the body is worthy of the soul, the shadow of its substance, the servant of his master, that is by negatively reflecting it. If the servant were a positive reflection of his lord, the shadow a positive reflection of its substance, the body a positive reflection of the soul, there would be no such thing as choosing between servant and lord, between shadow and substance, between body and soul. In short, we should live in a highly ridiculous world, in which all the needs of the human understanding had been wantonly violated. Analogically, then, the letter of revelation, by virtue of the limited intelligence to which it is addressed, is bound to obscure and falsify, to some extent, its own spiritual contents, just as the squint eyes, the crooked back, or inverted feet I have inherited from my past ancestry, obscure my spiritual form, my substantial contents, or as your image in a glass being addressed to your bodily, not your mental eye, falsifies your proper self-consciousness, turning what your mental eye pronounces your right-hand into your left, and so forth. It will not do, therefore, whatever the bare face of revelation declares, spiritually to assert a limitary incarnation of Deity, such an incarnation as not only apparently but really restricts Him to specific times, places, and persons. Because, if we do thus, we shall infallibly stifle the true scientific and spiritual conception which incessantly postulates His infinitude, that is, His complete exemption from these finite bonds.

Let us fully accept then the literal Christian dogma, but only as the indispensable basis of that sovereign spiritual verity, which lifts the Divine incarnation out of the realm of mere sensuous appearances—out of the limitations imposed by our natural stupidity—into a strictly universal truth, or one which is illustrated in every individual bosom of the race. The spiritual substance embodied in the literal Christian verity, is, that God vivifies man naturally no less than spiritually. It imports—no longer that this, that, and the other person becomes conjoined with God by his proper spiritual fermentation and ripening, but—that human nature itself, by its own distinctive process of fermentation and ripening denominated history, becomes henceforth eternally conjoined with the same Divine perfection. In fact, the Christian truth implies that all our private regenerative experiences have been only so many faint and feeble primitiæ of this grand public operation of God, only so many timid and starveling rills of this affluent Divine fountain in the very bosom of the race itself. This is the exact meaning of history, a process of spiritual fermentation and refining within the public or associated consciousness of man, or what is the same thing, the regeneration of our very nature. It means the development of a selfhood in man adequate to image the creative infinitude, and therefore scientifically fit to avouch the Divine creation. It means the gradual coming to consciousness on the part of the race, of its intimate and eternal alliance with all divine power and beauty; in short, the evolution of a Divine NATURAL manhood. Thus, as every true biography vindicates its claim to be written, only by relating how some private person, from being the abject offspring of his parents, became by God's inward nourishment a living soul or selfhood, capable of rising eternally away from his earthly nest, and forgetting on occasion every rudimental natural tie: so all veritable history busies itself with relating how that public person whom we denominate human nature becomes lifted by God's secret and ceaseless inspiration out of the abject mud of space and time, out of its purely mineral, vegetable, and animal anchorage, into the conscious fellowship of infinite goodness, and the consequent eternal supremacy of all inferior natures. Man has both a common or public personality and a private one: there is both a mind of the race and an individual mind: and the perfected scope of the Divine Providence or the consummation of human history, is the due CO-ORDINATION OF THESE DIVERGENT ELEMENTS, the interior or superior place accruing by every title to the individual or feminine element. But it is notorious that man has never intelligently seconded the divine purpose herein. On the contrary he has always done his most pompous best to resist it. His most accredited theologies and philosophies have diligently taught him, by sensual instigation, that Eve was essentially subject to Adam, that is, that the private or individual force in man was rightfully secondary and servile to the common or public force: and hence it is the invariable lot of these theologies and philosophies to find themselves disowned by the advance of history, which is the growth of man's scientific insight. History quietly antiquates and paralyzes every creed, sacred or secular, which defames the human soul by representing it as freely alienating itself from God: because the sole beatific function of history is to prove such alienation impossible, save under conditions of servitude, when the mind is a prey to the tyranny of ignorance and superstition.

The march of history incessantly vindicates the rightful primacy of the affections, or what is the same thing, incessantly quickens the spontaneous force in us, by depressing our voluntary or moral force.* The moral life of man is a phenomenon of our scientific immaturity. It grows out of our appropriating to ourselves the good or the evil we do, instead of ascribing it exclusively to the hereditary influx of good and evil spirits, and hence feeling no more responsibility for it, no more sense of merit or demerit in regard to it, than we should feel in regard to a fair or muddy complexion, to a sunny or sombre natural disposition. So long as we continue stupidly to munch this pestilent fruit, it is of course inevitable that we find ourselves excluded from the Tree of Life. I say "of course," because manifestly all the while we go on to appropriate this strictly influent good and evil, we cannot help attributing to ourselves a purely simplistic or differential selfhood, so remaining utterly blind to the great scientific truth of our unitary or composite existence: and, coming before God in that miserly plight, in that lean and penurious condition, the voice of the Divine mercy towards us is bound to shroud itself in tones of despair, only faintly relieved by distant hope. For God sees us only in the intensest unity with our kind, only in indissoluble solidarity with every other individual of the race; and consequently, whilst we view ourselves as independently constituted, as related to Him by our own absolute merit or demerit, irrespectively of our connexion with the race, we must necessarily be full either of egotistic pride or equally egotistic despair, and in both cases alike can hardly help proving an extremely unsatisfactory spectacle to Him. What should we think of an eye or a hand that deemed itself related to the light and air by itself, and independently of its connexion with the body? Why, obviously, that it was diseased and ready to perish. Well, the infinite wisdom makes precisely that judgment of us, when we fancy ourselves righteous or unrighteous in our own right, and apart from our unity with our kind. There is no pretension more insufferably arrogant in the Divine sight than that of any merely individual ability to keep the Divine law.

* See Appendix D.

I am persuaded that I never cut a more contemptible figure in the Divine estimation, than when I suppose myself capable of refraining from stealing my neighbour's purse, or seducing my neighbour's wife, by some private force of my own, and independently of angelic association, or of the help I derive from my connexion with the race. And I presume on the other hand that there is no attitude of mind more intrinsically respectable in the Divine sight, more cordially delightful to the Divine mind, than that which should exhibit the thief or adulterer totally indifferent to the unrighteousness which is conventionally charged upon his private character, while he calmly referred all the evil of his conduct to the wholly unscientific aspect of our social relations, to the shockingly imperfect way in which the sentiment of human equality or fellowship is yet organized in institutions. God hates nothing on earth but kings and priests: that is to say, never the veritable human persons that are hereditarily or traditionally swaddled in those effete offices, but the offices or institutions themselves so named: because they are the only things which now obstruct the Divine kingdom upon earth, by hindering the scientific organization of human fellowship. And whatsoever hinders that, His perfect love to mankind bids Him hate, bids Him hand over to speedy and remorseless destruction. I am for my own part neither a thief nor an adulterer, but I could almost long to be both one and the other after the most flagrant type, that thus I might fling back with exquisite scorn the imputation of unrighteousness wherewith society would seek in that ease to cover me—or rather, that thus I might drink in with keener relish the profound conviction which all history, which all science, brings home to me, namely, that in my real, my spiritual, private, and God-given self I am wholly incapable of evil either in affection, thought, or action, and that it is therefore only in my quasi, my conventional, public, and man-given self, that I ever find myself incurring such liability. Thus I would never seek to hide, but rather to make conspicuous, all the iniquity charged upon me: only I would insist upon its being an iniquity which attached to me, not as disconnected with other men, but as intimately blent and bound up with priest and king, with teacher and ruler, with every devout and honourable person in short, who is officially interested in maintaining the existing infirm organization of human society or fellowship.*

But I can no longer afford these digressions, which after all are no digressions, except to a hurried observation. My space warns me to come rapidly to a close. I have just said that the progress of history in depressing the moral vigour of the race, operates an incessant elevation of its spontaneous force. This result ensues by virtue of the same law which in the physical sphere limits the menstrual flux by the phenomena of conception and gestation. For morality is exactly the same phenomenon in the spiritual sphere, or the life of the race, which menstruation is in the natural sphere, or the life of woman, that is to say, it is a process of elimination or purification; and it operates precisely the same uses, that is to say, it abates the natural pride and vigour of the heart, and so disposes it to conceive and bring forth spiritual fruit.* The end of conscience is to pu-

* See Appendix E.

* Recent physiological researches go to shew that the menstrual flux signalizes the spontaneous maturation of the ovum and its consequent separation from the ovary and descent into the uterus, for the purpose of impregnation. At all events, it seems to be clearly established, that conception ordinarily takes place just before or just after menstruation, and is very rare at other times; so that we may fairly infer a very close connexion between the two. But the science of correspondences, which is the only Divine science, because it is the science of the very sciences themselves—turning the sandy wilderness of disconnected facts which they present to us into the unity of a blooming garden—dissipates all doubt as to the function of menstruation, by turning it into a strict analogon and ultimate of that great spiritual ordeal of purification which we denominate conscience. The aim of menstruation is purification, is such a vastation of the native grossness of the body, as disposes it to conception and proliferation. Consequently, until menstruation begins, conception is impossible, and it is equally impossible after menstruation has ceased. Then, again, woman alone menstruates, because she is a natural form or representation of the selfhood in man, or of that thing which is eventually to ally him with God by redeeming him from animality: and it is only the selfhood as still unconscious of its function and beguiled by the senses, or the fallacious shows of things, that conrify, and so prepare the soul for immortal conjunction with God: and purification means that gradual depletion of the natural selfhood or proprium which constitutes all that is valuable in our historic experience. I know very well that morality is not popularly supposed to play this subordinate part in human affairs. Every consistent churchman and statesman will revolt at my assigning it this strictly ministerial office, this purely solvent or transitional efficacy. It constitutes in fact the still invincible strength of hell on earth, that morality is everywhere looked upon as having a properly magisterial authority, as furnishing the indisputable Divine breath of our spiritual life. You might with equal propriety look upon physics as furnishing not merely the outward condition—the necessary platform or base—of our moral life, but its inward science seeks to purify. The mere Adamic or animal life is innocent enough in all the range of its passions and appetites, and consequently invites no purgation. It is only the Divinely-given selfhood of man, which, owing to its ignorance and inexperience of its true source is for a long time unworthily duped by the senses, and so subjected to the Adamic or bodily rule, that demands chastisement. Hence it is that woman alone, being the true analogon of this selfhood, menstruates, and so becomes physically qualified for maternity. If you wish any light upon the physiological question here adverted to, you may consult a careful and conscientious work of M. POUCHET, entitled Theorie de l'Ovulation Spontanée, and a little book of RACIBORSKI on the same subject, which I have also read with interest, but whose title I do not now recall. The supplement to Baly's translation of Müller's Physiology furnishes a good abstract of all the literature of the topic.

substance also. The wrong done to truth in either case is precisely the same. In fact the peacock who parades his lustrous plumage to captivate our admiration, is only a sensible type of that subtler foppery, of that more harmful pharisaism, which confounds moral distinctions with spiritual, or supposes a man divinely vivified not by what unites him with other men, but only by what separates him from them. Hell has no profounder root than this.* The entire diabolic nisus in humanity

* Hell is nothing but the gradual sloughing-off or separation in the angelic mind of self-love from charity, which separation is necessitated so long as the Divine life in nature is practically inchoate. The Divine NATURAL man of course comprehends in his own person both heaven and hell, and reconciles them equally to the Divine good: or if a difference be insisted on, he makes the latter even more tributary than the former to that good. But until that achievement becomes so far consummated in interior realms of creation as to be avouched to our natural consciousness by the plenary diffusion of the Holy Spirit, the promised Comforter, which is the truly scientific spirit of human fellowship or equality, heaven and hell remain at war, and the angel grows an angel only by the spiritual elimination and precipitation of what in him is hereditarily diabolic. Thus angelic existence confesses itself undivine by all the bulk of those various hells, which it voids upon the universe in the process of asserting itself. The hells are only so much incomparable Divine force spiritually disowned by the angel, turned to waste by his sheer incapacity freely to image God, that is, to do good spontaneously. Indeed the heavens had long ere now been swamped and stifled in their own proper ordure, had not the Divine Wisdom known how to utilize the lowest hells (even as the skilful husbandman knows how to utilize his festering heaps of manure), by transforming them into the substance of a new and more glorious manhood.

dates indeed from this grossly fallacious estimate of truth. It is the infirmity of the unscientific mind, of the understanding enlightened only by sense to confound nature with spirit, fact with truth : to mistake the actual for the real or seeming for being. Thus, inasmuch as I sensibly appear to be an absolute existence, or to have a selfhood utterly distinct from and independent of angel and devil, my unpractised reason is incontinently beguiled to conclude that such is really the case, and hastens to confirm the shallow fallacy by zealously affiliating to my spiritual self all the good and evil which hereditarily influence my nature : so filling me in spirit with an odious self-conceit or an equally odious self-distrust, which both alike engender hell in me, because they both alike exclude that bosom-peace which makes the immortal substance of every bliss known to heaven. Hell has no root but human pride, and the earth by which that root thrives would be instantly dissolved, were we manfully to cease "eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil : " that is, cease attributing to ourselves the moral traits which flow solely from our hereditary connexion with heaven and hell, by appropriating those superior spiritual qualities which come to us from God alone, and which presuppose the complete reconciliation of hell with heaven. At all events such has been the undeniable drift of history. That great institution which we call the Church, has had no other aim, from the beginning of history, than to depress the moral consciousness of man, or shame him out of pride and boastfulness, by exalting his æsthetic consciousness, or making him feel that he is what he is, not by virtue of any difference between him and other men, but only by virtue of his intense unity with them. Religion, revelation, has had no diviner office than to convince mankind that their highest virtue, morally regarded, all that virtue which exalts one man above another in social estimation, and so enacts the reign of hell on earth, is filthy rags in God's sight; because, when men are once persuaded of this, they will gladly accept the righteousness which is revealed to them from God out of heaven, and which needs no inauguration but that which is afforded it by the scientific recognition of the great truth of human society or fellowship. Of course all that is sentimental in you will howl at this assertion, as feeling the very breath of its nostrils invaded: for sentimentalism enjoys a purely outward and osculatory dalliance with truth, and if deeper relations be insisted on, nothing is left it but to go forth with the most sentimental of the apostles and hang itself. But I speak advisedly after years of patient inquiry, and no amount of clamour can affect my conviction that the truth I here allege constitutes the adamantine basis of creation.

Yours truly,

APPENDIX.

A.—p. 138.

I quote here a few pages from a previous book of mine now out of print, entitled Lectures and Miscellanies :—

“When I speak of the influence of ghostly communications upon ‘weak-minded persons,’ I mean persons who, like myself, have been educated in sheerly erroneous views of individual responsibility. After my religious life dawned, my day was turned into hideous and unrelieved night by tacit ghostly visitations. I not merely repented myself, as one of my theological teachers deemed it incumbent on me, of Adam’s transgression, but every dubious transaction I had been engaged in from my youth up, no matter how insignificant soever, crept forth from its oblivious slime to paralyze my soul with threats of God’s judgment. So paltry an incident of my youth as the throwing snow-balls, and that effectually too, at a younger brother in order to prevent his following me at play, had power, I recollect, to keep me awake all night, bedewing my pillow with tears, and beseeching God to grant me forgiveness. By dint of indefatigable prayer and other ritual observance, I managed indeed to stave off actual despair from the beginning; and juster views of the divine character obtained from the New Testament, gradually illumined my very dense understanding, and gave me comparative peace. But I had no satisfactory glimpse of the source of all the infernal jugglery I had undergone till I learned from Swedenborg, that it proceeds from certain ghostly busy-bodies intent upon reducing the human mind to their subjection, and availing themselves for this purpose of every sensuous and fallacious idea we entertain of God, and of every disagreeable memory we retain of our own conduct.

“I call this information ‘satisfactory,’ because it accorded with my own observation. The suffering I underwent confessed itself an infliction, an imposition. I writhed under it as you have seen a beast writhe under a burden too heavy for him to lift, yet not quite heavy enough to crush him out of life. For I could not accept the imputation borne in upon me, that I was really chargeable with the guilt of any of these remembered iniquities. I of course did not deny an external or instrumental connexion with them; I did not deny that my hand had incurred defilement, but with my total heart and mind I resisted any closer affiliation. In reference, for example, to the trivial incident above specified, even while weeping scalding tears over its remembrance, I could not but be conscious of a present tenderness toward the imaginary sufferer, so cordial and so profuse as totally to acquit my inner or vital self of any complicity in the premises. Hence I had little doubt that the fact might be as Swedenborg alleged, and that I had been all along nourishing, by means of certain falsities in my intellect, a brood of ghostly loafers who had at last very nearly turned me out of house and home.

“It is not uncommon to hear the canting remark, that the world would be better off if men had a little more of the suffering in question. I have no objection to every man understanding the evil of his doings. On the contrary, I wish that every one might clearly discern his habitual iniquities, because until this discernment takes place, we shall not be in haste to put them away from us. But we shall never be able truly to confess them with the heart, so long as we believe ourselves the source of them—so long as we believe in our individual responsibility for them. The first step toward my acknowledging the evil of my doings, is my perception of its being a foreign influx or importation. If I view it as indigenous, of course I cannot deem it evil, for you would not have the same soil which brings forth the fruit condemn it also, would you? No man is wiser than himself. How therefore can you expect any one to acknowledge an evil in his conduct, unless you tacitly attribute to him an inward or essential superiority to that evil? If the evil come strictly from himself or within, if it do not proceed merely from defective culture, but grow out of the very substance of his individuality, then you simply insult him by asking him to repent it, or turn away from it. Would you ask a crab-apple stock to produce peaches, or a bramble-bush to bring forth grapes? Why then stultify yourself by expecting the peaceable fruits of righteousness from those whom at the same time you teach to regard themselves as the sources of their sin?

“I do not read that John the Baptist, who was reckoned a pattern revivalist, ever taught people to get up a spiritual fidget, by way of qualifying themselves for the acknowledgment of the coming divine man. I read that he simply told each man to repent him of, or forsake, the evils incident to his proper vocation, the manifest patent evils which all men recognized and suffered from, and so stand prepared to do the will of the coming teacher. The attempt to fasten the authorship or responsibility of these offences upon the individual soul, and to establish the subject's metaphysical property in them, he left to the bloodhound sagacity of our modern theologians. It may be very grand and lofty in these perfunctory gentlemen to discourse upon the depth of human depravity, and so forth, but I have no hesitation in saying that the man who would really aggravate the self-condemnation of another, or intensify instead of moderate his conviction of personal defilement, no matter on what pretext soever of benevolence, is either himself grossly inexperienced in this horrid category of suffering, or else, may boast a heart harder than the nether mill-stone. He may have had what he calls troubles of conscience, but they have simply been got up for an occasion, got up with a view to his passing muster with his sect, or boasting an orthodox religious experience. An immense deal of this spiritual dilettantism exists in the world. The mere outside foppery we see in Broadway is as the fragrance of fresh hay in comparison with it.

“No one can object to another kindly pointing out any of his discernible evils of life, because every man feels it due to his manhood to rid it of all impediment. But clearly this is a very different thing from the endeavour to affix guilt to the soul. I know nothing so profoundly diabolic as this endeavour, whencesoever it may be exerted, from the pulpit or the closet, and for whatsoever ends, whether conventionally sacred or profane. To aim at making a poor wretch feel, that while simply obeying some dictate of nature, or perhaps some prompting of wounded passion, he has mortally affronted the very source of his life—that he even has it in his power to affront it—is a wickedness beside which, it appears to me, most of our burglaries and murders seem commonplace and tender. It is spiritual murder, murder not of the mere perishing body, but of the imperishable soul. And the man who is guilty of it, should be put to the penalty of silence for the remainder of his days, or at least until he proves himself better instructed. He very probably has a bosom full of parental tenderness, even while he is making so deadly an assault upon you in the name of his God, and would sooner renounce his own life than cherish a vindictive temper towards his dependent offspring. In which case of course, he is vastly more worshipful than the fetish he serves.

“But you say that this man does not leave you hopeless, that even while charging guilt upon you, he points you to the all-sufficient remedy for it. Alas! this apology proceeds upon the notion that a man’s relation to God is merely physical or external, and that consequently provided he escapes a literal scourging from the divine hand, his aspirations are satisfied. Let every one speak for himself here. For my part, I am free to say, that I should be far more profoundly horrified by the idea of my capacity to offend God—even though I should never actually do it—than I should be by a fear of all the literal scourgings possible to be inflicted upon me, by all the self-styled deities of the universe. A deity who has it either in his hand or his heart, to inflict a wound upon any form of sensitive existence, is a deity of decidedly puerile and disreputable pattern. He is no deity for cultivated men and women. A deity whose prestige is chiefly muscular, arising from his imagined ability to inflict suffering, may still serve the needs of the Bushman, or the Choctaw, or our own rowdies : but to those in whom God's life has dawned however faintly, and whose souls accordingly are evermore consecrated to beauty, he is an unmitigated abomination. For a person of this quality knows no outward relations to God, no such relations as are contemplated or provided for by your mere pugilistic deity. God is his inmost life, without whom in fact he does not live : God is his vital selfhood, without whom indeed he is not himself : to talk therefore of enmity between him and God, is to talk of dividing him asunder, is to talk of separating his form from his substance, his existence from his being.

“ I distrust accordingly these ghostly busy-bodies, who address our outward ear with gossip of the other world. They first arrest our attention by talk of those we have loved : they gradually inflame our ascetic ambition, our ambition after spiritual distinction : and finally, having got a secure hold, who knows through what pools of voluntary filth and degradation they may drag us ? I of course believe that spiritual help is incessantly enjoyed by man, but then it is a help directed exclusively to his affections and thoughts, not to his timorous and servile senses. The spiritual succour which comes in the way of quickening my intellect and affections, I am grateful for. It does not degrade me. It aggrandizes me, and makes my life more free. But that which comes in the form of outward and personal dictation, is an insult to my manhood, and in so far as it is tolerated, undermines it. It makes my will servile to a foreign inspiration, discharges my soul of its inherent divinity, and finally leaves me a dismal wreck, high and dry on the sands of superstition. It reduces me in fact below the level of the brute, for the brute has a certain reflected or colonial manhood, which disqualifies him for the tacit endurance of oppression. I am not speaking of impossibilities. We have all heard of tender and devout persons, who having through some foolish asceticism, or other accidental cause, come under the influence of this attenuated despotism, have at last got back to their own firesides, so spent with suffering, so lacerated to the very core, as to be fit—when not aroused to an indignant and manly reaction—only for the soothing shelter of the grave.

“On the whole I am led to regard these so-called ‘spirits’ rather as so many vermin revealing themselves in the tumble-down walls of our old theological hostelry, than as any very saintly and sweet persons, whose acquaintance it were edifying or even comfortable to make. I hope their pale activity—their bloodless and ghastly vivacity—may do indirect good by promoting a general disgust for the abject personal gossip which they deal out to us, and which has so long furnished the staple spiritual commodity of the old theology. But I vehemently discredit the prospect of any positive good. Man’s true good never comes from without him, but only from the depths of divinity within him, and whatever tends to divert his attention from this truth, and fix it on Mahomedan paradises, and salvation through electricity, claims his most vindictive anathema. Above all, a spiritual life which feels itself depleted by the diligent prosecution of the natural one, which is actually interested to invade the latter, and persuade good sound flesh and blood to barter its savoury cakes and ale for trite and faded sentimentalities, is a life which every reasonable person may safely scout as unworthy his aspiration.

“The mere personal gossip these ghostly gents remit to us, proves of what a flimsy and gossamer quality they themselves are, and how feeble a grasp they have yet achieved of life. I am told that a communication was lately received from Tom Paine and Ethan Allen, saying that they were boarding at a hotel kept by John Bunyan, and I can readily fancy the shaking of sides, and the rich asthmatic wheeze, wherewith that communication was launched by the inveterate wags who projected it. But we are also told very seriously, that the apostle Paul and other distinguished persons, have each a chosen medium in our neighbourhood, on whom to dump his particular wisdom, and so establish a depôt for that commodity. And I learn besides that Dr. Franklin, Dr. Channing, and several other well-behaved persons, are turning out mere incontinent busy-bodies, and instead of attending to their own affairs, have actually turned round again in the endeavour to instruct and regulate a world, which had previously seen fit to discharge them. Was ever any pretension more intrinsically disorderly and immodest ! The apostle Paul, in the estimation of all scholars, was a man of great sense and modesty. And the doctors Franklin and Channing were also conspicuous for both traits. Now is it credible for a moment that these great men are turned into such hopeless peacocks by the mere event of death, as to fancy that either of them is capable of exerting the least influence upon human destiny, or the destiny of the least individual? Credat Judæus, non ego. Far easier is it for me to believe, that certain spectral Slenders and Shallows have been donning the dress of these good men, as found folded up and ticketed on the shelves of somebody's reverential memory, and vainly trying in that guise to ape also the illustrious manners which once sanctified it.

"I am persuaded that this entire hobgoblin demonstration owes its existence to the superstitious and semi-Pagan conceptions of spiritual existence which overrun society, and which are diligently nurtured by the old theology. The old theology represents the spiritual world as remote from the natural one in space. It supposes that when men die, they actually traverse space, actually go somewhere, and bring up either at a certain fixed locale within the realm of sense, constituting heaven, or at another fixed locale constituting hell. Books even are written to suggest the probable latitude of these places, whether within or without our solar system, and so forth. But this is clearly puerile. The spiritual world does not fall within time and space. Time and space simply express two most general laws or methods by which the sensuous understanding, or the intelligence enlightened only by the senses, apprehends spiritual existence, or gathers knowledge. Thus, man, being a creature of infinite love and wisdom, is spiritually, or in his most intimate self, a form of affection and intellect. But intellect and affection are purely subjective existences: they are not things, visible to sense: they are forms of life. Hence unless some plane exist, in which these forms may be mirrored, and in which at the same time, man's faculty may be organized to discern them, he must for ever remain unconscious of himself, devoid of conscious life. He must in fact remain for ever blent with Deity, or infinitude, and therefore dead to all that stupendous epic of passion, intellect, and action, which constitutes his present history, and which is based exclusively upon his finite natural experience.

“For nature furnishes this necessary plane, and its two universal laws, the one named time, serving sharply to discriminate to our perception event from event, and the other named space, serving sharply to discriminate to our perception form from form, supply us with the fixed alphabet of all knowledge. Accordingly whatsoever is in space and time, whatsoever falls within the realm of sense and fills the page of history, is purely phenomenal. It is not being, but only the appearance of being to a limited intelligence, an intelligence limited by the senses. Hence the sacredest incidents of history are not essential facts of humanity, but representative facts,—facts which merely symbolize infinite and eternal verities, or verities which utterly disclaim space and time. My true being, the being of every man, is God, or infinite goodness and truth. Now infinite goodness and truth, though they reveal themselves to a finite appreciation under the forms of time and space, under sensible forms, yet are not themselves sensible forms, but spiritual forms, which quite transcend time and space. Consequently my being, my essential selfhood, is always independent of space and time, and when I die therefore or become invisible to sense, the event is purely circumferential and does not affect my central quality. That remains as immutable as God, because it is God, and is consequently in no danger of being compromised by any event of my outward or sensible experience. All these events do but image, or bring to my own consciousness, the wonders of divinity which are shut up within me and in all men. And the event of death itself is only more signal than other events, because it makes this thrilling imagery more near and miraculous, by opening my consciousness to an inner field of being, in which time and space are no longer fixed but pliant to the affections of the individual, or in which every outward event and every outward form are visibly born of the subject's private selfhood, and not as here of his common nature."

B.—p. 142.

The creative and eternal Word to man runs thus: "Of every tree in the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat, BECAUSE IN THE DAY THOU EATEST THEREOF THOU SHALT SURELY DIE." Philosophers have long sought to demonstrate the reality of human freedom as evinced in the phenomena of our moral consciousness, but they have only succeeded in demonstrating the unhappy muddle Philosophy herself amounts to, so long as she superciliously disdains the guiding light of revelation, and seeks to interpret nature by the servile light which nature herself supplies. Our moral freedom is in truth only a semblance, not a reality. We seem to act freely, or of ourselves, when we steal or refrain from stealing, when we commit adultery or refrain from it: and man's judgment accordingly, which is limited to appearances, asks no further warrant to render us in either case blame-or-praise-worthy. But, as Swedenborg proves on every page of his remarkable writings, we really never do act in freedom or of ourselves under these circumstances. He shews by the most luminous exposition of spiritual laws that we never steal or commit adultery, however free the act seem to our foolish selves, but by the overwhelming tyranny of hell; and that we never refrain from doing these things except by virtue of the Lord's power constraining us to do so in spite of our natural tendencies. We feel this power to be in ourselves, that is to be freely exerted, only because we do not sensibly discern the fields of spiritual existence from which alone it inflows, and our senses have hitherto ruled our reason in place of serving it. No man since the world has stood has ever had power to draw a physical or moral breath, independently of those celestial and infernal companies with which all his past ancestry interiorly but unconsciously associates him. Of course therefore the Divine Love is incapable of ascribing any one's physical and moral merit or demerit to the person himself, because it would be absurdly false to do so. On the contrary, it seeks with endless pains to prevent the man himself from doing this by the organization of conscience as an unfaltering ministry of death. Our most accredited theologies and philosophies have always alike misapprehended the scope of this relentless ministry. They suppose that conscience was originally intended as a ministry of life or righteousness, and that Adam accordingly enjoyed its favourable testimony in Paradise before he had eaten of the tree of knowledge, that is, before he had learned to approprate good and evil to himself. But of what possible use could the approbation of conscience be to a being who was still ignorant of the difference between good and evil? The transparent contradiction involved in the assumption sufficiently demonstrates its absurdity to the reason; but the literal text of revelation demonstrates it also to the very senses, by shewing us that conscience first dawned in Adam after self hood (Eve) had been developed in him, and he had been led by it to eat of the tree of knowledge, that is, to appropriate his influent good and evil to himself.

Adam symbolizes the immature condition of the mind, the merely seeming and constitutional side of man, the life of instinct which we derive from nature, and which through the decease operated in us by conscience, we ultimately lay aside in order to the assumption of our true and spontaneous life derived directly from God. Hence—what is perfectly consistent, if you regard the spiritual purport of the narrative, but perfectly absurd if you regard only its letter—the most pregnant service which Eve (representing the divinely endowed self hood) renders Adam, is to throw him instantly out of Paradise, by unmuzzling within him the relentless jaws of conscience. Do you ask me what I mean by Eve, as the symbol of our divinely quickened self hood? I will tell you. Adam, as we have seen, represents our finite or constitutional existence, that which flows from our connection with the race. It seems to be a most real existence, while in truth it is a purely reflected one, the subject being nothing but what he is made by the spiritual world, being in fact as destitute of real self hood or freedom as if he were only dove or rabbit and not man. The dove or rabbit remains spiritually unquickened, devoid of true individuality, because it is a purely animal form, that is, a form in which the universal element dominates the individual one. It is, in other words, and ever remains, an unshrinking subject of its nature, and hence incapable of "eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil," that is, of appropriating good and evil to itself. It has no consciousness of a selfhood underived from its nature, and is consequently utterly incapable both of moral experience, and of that lustrous life of conjunction with God in which such experience, when left unperturbed, infallibly merges. But Adam, the beautiful symbol of our nascent humanity, of our still instinctual and pre-moral beginnings, is lifted above animality by his human form, that form being the only one in which the universal element serves the individual one, and which therefore fitly images God. Hence, though he is but a rudimental and seeming man, he is bound at once to vindicate his essential divinity, by exhibiting, in however rude and purely negative a form, the real and distinctive life which animates humanity. The distinction of man from all lower existences is, that he is in strictest truth the child of God, that Infinite Love and Wisdom constitute his veritable and exclusive parentage, and Infinite Love and Wisdom are utterly inconsistent with selfishness or with littleness of any description. Hence in Christ, who is the perfected and fully conscious Divine Man, we see his merely finite and quasi or constitutional life, his purely Adamic selfhood, incessantly deposed in order to his glorification, in order to his consummate union with God. In Adam consequently, who is but the prophetic or typical and unconscious divine man, we must expect to see death installed as the very fons et principium vitæ, as the very fountain and spring of human life; we must expect to see despair enthroned as the fertile and abounding womb of man's distinctive hope. In short, we must demand from Adam, as the symbol of our rudimental and initiatory manhood, a purely negative and mortuary experience; that is to say, we must expect to see him divorced from his merely seeming and dramatic existence, by falling under the dominion of conscience or the moral law.

By Eve, then, or our divinely vivified selfhood, is meant the power which is incessantly communicated to man of separating himself from his mere animal conditions, of elevating himself out of the realm of law into that of life, or of subjecting nature and society to the needs of his individuality. In short, Eve signifies the power in man of spiritually appropriating good and evil to himself, the faculty of spiritual consciousness. Let the animal do as he will, he is but the abject vassal of his nature, and therefore destitute of personality or character, destitute of spiritual consciousness. The animal is only naturally, never spiritually, good or evil. The dove is naturally good as contrasted with the vulture, the tiger is naturally evil as contrasted with the sheep, but you would never think of deeming the dove spiritually good or the tiger spiritually evil as contrasted with any other animal, especially as contrasted with any other dove or tiger. Why? Because spiritual good and evil is individual good and evil, that is, it implies in the subject a spiritual individuality uncontrolled by his nature. The animals have no such individuality, and hence are ignorant of moral distinctions, are unworthy of individual praise or blame. They have a purely natural individuality, and hence are incapable of eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, or of viewing themselves as spiritually responsible for their influent good and evil. Of man alone is it lawful to predicate moral distinctions, because he alone is capable of appropriating his influent good and evil to himself in place of charging it upon his nature. He alone is capable of an alternate individual expansion and collapse, which unless the Divine Mercy overruled them to his endless benefit, would breed only the most disastrous consequences. He is capable at one moment of a spiritual conceit and pride which plunges him gaily into hell, at the next of a spiritual despair which shuts him sorrowfully out of heaven. For example, if moral good prevail in my natural disposition, if I pass my life in visiting prisons, building hospitals, feeding the poor, scattering tracts, circulating the Bible, forwarding every conventionally righteous enterprize, while maintaining at the same time an irreproachable private and social deportment, I shall be infallibly certain—unless the Divine Love expose me to incessant secret or spiritual shipwreck, to the most withering internal humiliation and disaster—to appropriate this good to myself, and so turn out a monster of spiritual pride, a being too inflated even for hell to tolerate. Or if moral evil preponderate in my natural character, if on all occasions of temptation I succumb, and convict myself of lying, theft, adultery, and what not, I shall be sure in these circumstances—unless the Divine Love visit me with incessant outward success and prosperity—to shut myself up in a despair too obdurate even for the warmest love of heaven to penetrate it. These experiences, mournful as they seem when too narrowly viewed, nevertheless attest the grandeur of human nature. They are possible to us only because our distinctively human life dates from God, and is therefore a spontaneous life, a life whose principle of action falls exclusively within the subject, and renders him therefore eternally free. Of course this life presupposes the complete reconciliation of self-love with brotherly love, presupposes the scientific inauguration of human society, human fellowship, human equality, and these issues again presuppose a conflict of these two forces, suppose, that is, a previous stage of human experience in which self-love is at war with brotherly love, or hell autagonizes heaven in lieu of promoting it. Now so long as this infantile state of things endures, so long as self-love and brotherly love, or hell and heaven, are kept unreconciled by the immaturity of the scientific understanding in man, we each of us, by virtue of the solidarity that binds us to the race, feel this conflict in our own bosoms as if it originated there, or belonged to ourselves, instead of being a veritable influx from the entire spiritual world, or the universal mind of man. We have not the least suspicion that the conflict is not our own private affair, is not a legitimate feature of our divinely given individuality, and accordingly as one or the other principle prevails in our life, we contentedly write ourselves down good or evil in the Divine sight, turning out wretched Pharisees in the former case, and despised publicans and harlots in the latter. We have not the slightest conception of our true and spontaneous life, nor consequently of the miraculous exhibitions of Divine wealth and power with which it is fraught. We have no idea that that life is so divinely majestic and perfect as to involve in itself the complete reconciliation of hell and heaven, the intensest harmony of self-love and brotherly love, of the external and internal man. Not knowing this, we inevitably suppose that our spiritual experience belongs to our isolated private bosoms, qualifying us individually in the sight of God; and we therefore go on to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil with a stupid gusto that of necessity disallows the true consciousness of God in our souls, and turns His inward voice of love and mercy into one of implacable condemnation and death.

C.—p. 159.

“THE INCLINATION TO UNITE THE MAN TO HERSELF IS CONSTANT AND PERPETUAL WITH THE WIFE, BUT INCONSTANT AND ALTERNATE WITH THE MAN. The reason of this is, because love cannot do otherwise than love and unite itself, in order that it may be loved in return, this being its very essence and life; and women are born loves; whereas men, with whom they unite themselves in order that they may be loved in return, are receptions. Moreover love is continually efficient; being like heat, flame, and fire, which perish if their efficiency is checked. Hence the inclination to unite the man to herself is constant and perpetual with the wife: but a similar inclination does not operate with the man towards the wife, because the man is not love, but only a recipient of love; and as a state of reception is absent or present according to intruding cares, and to the varying presence or absence of heat in the mind, as derived from various causes, and also according to the increase and decrease of the bodily powers, which do not return regularly and at stated periods, it follows, that the inclination to conjunction is inconstant and alternate with men.

“CONJUNCTION IS INSPIRED INTO THE MAN FROM THE WIFE ACCORDING TO HER LOVE, AND IS RECEIVED BY THE MAN ACCORDING TO HIS WISDOM. That love and consequent conjunction is inspired into the man by the wife, is at this day concealed from the men; yea, it is universally denied by them; because wives insinuate that the men alone love, and that they themselves receive; or that the men are loves, and themselves obediences: they rejoice also in heart when the men believe it to be so. There are several reasons why they endeavour to persuade the men of this, which are all grounded in their prudence and circumspection. The reason why men receive from their wives the inspiration or insinuation of love, is, because nothing of conjugal love, or even of the love of the sex, is with the men, but only with wives and females. That this is the case, has been clearly shewn me in the spiritual world. I was once engaged in conversation there on this subject; and the men, in consequence of a persuasion infused from their wives, insisted that they loved and not the wives; but that the wives received love from them. In order to settle the dispute respecting this arcanum, all the females, married and unmarried, were withdrawn from the men, and at the same time the sphere of the love of the sex was removed with them. On the removal of this sphere the men were reduced to a very unusual state, such as they had never before perceived, at which they greatly complained. Then, while they were in this state, the females were brought to them, and the wives to the husbands; and both the wives and the other females addressed them in the tenderest and most engaging manner; but they were cold to their tenderness, and turned away, and said one to another, "What is all this? what is a female?" And when some of the women said that they were their wives, they replied, "What is a wife? we do not know you." But when the wives began to be grieved at this absolutely cold indifference of the men, and some of them to shed tears, the sphere of the love of the female sex, and the conjugal sphere, which had for a time been withdrawn from the men, was restored; and then the men instantly returned into their former state, the lovers of marriage into their state, and the lovers of the sex into theirs. Thus the men were convinced, that nothing of conjugal love, or even of the love of the sex, resides with them, but only with the wives and females. Nevertheless, the wives afterwards, from their prudence, induced the men to believe that love resides with the men, and that some small spark of it may pass from them into the wives."—Conjugal Love, n. 160, 161.

D.—p. 229.

It is of this historically avouched decline of moral power in humanity that my admired friend Carlyle complains in so many exquisite pages of mingled pathos and invective. Carlyle has apparently not the slightest conception of the new and perfect manhood which is dawning, and cherishes every vestige of the old forceful and fanatic type in that sort, as Old Mortality cherished the fading hic jacets upon the tombstones of the martyrs. Carlyle's heroes no doubt were a good style of men in their day, but their day was strictly in order to ours, which, bemoan it as you will, is an incomparably brighter one for humanity than the earth has ever before known. What should we say of a gardener who went on cultivating the gnarled and sturdy trunk of a vine, long after it had yielded all the fruit it was capable of? Precisely the same must we think of Carlyle, whose infatuation consists, not in the desire reverently to bury the past, but to revive it in conditions which would be obviously and utterly fatal to its continued existence for a moment. The truth is, Carlyle is an accomplished artist, who hangs one's house with historic portraits and tableaux of an incomparable lustre; but as to the scope of history itself—as to what men call the philosophy of history, meaning thereby the great human soul which gives it the unity of a man, and which is fast coming to superb and perfect consciousness by it—he is so exquisitely blind as to be even scornfully vituperative. It would make your ears tingle to hear the thunderous mirth with which on occasion he belabours the scientific conception of human destiny, to hear the great guns of riotous laughter which he lets off in broadsides upon the poor innocent soul who fancies that a science of history is strictly possible—he who will abide no other ideal for man than that of proving an eternal bruiser. I cannot help, much as I esteem Carlyle, recognizing here the essentially Barnum conception of manhood, never unconscious youthful grace and symmetry, but everywhere gigantic overgrowth contrasted by dwarfish undergrowth. The Barnum type of godhead is strictly proportionate: nowhere the benignant power which gives life to all things by sedulously concealing itself and shunning recognition ; but some egregious posture-master, who on a set day plants himself in the centre of space and dramatically conjures all things out of nothing in a way to astonish Robert Houdin himself, and all whom he astonishes. But let Carlyle pipe what melodious notes he pleases (and surely I shall be the last to grow weary of listening), science is bent upon utterly sapping our reverence for the great historic names, simply because this greatness all proceeds upon the implication of will or moral force, and science traces all will, all morality, to the devil, that is, to the servile side of human nature. Morality in fact is only the Divine method of taming the devil, or schooling him to the hearty allegiance of man. Moral life is born of an enforced subjection of the affections to the intellect, of the individual sentiment to the common one ; whilst the Divine or spontaneous life is born of a cordial marriage between the affections and the intellect, between the sentiment of individuality and that of community. Hence it is, that so long as the moral régime endures, so long as men continue to eat of the accursed fruit “ of the tree of knowledge of good and evil,” or foolishly appropriate to themselves what science declares to be exclusively from angelic and infernal association, so long the Divine voice in their souls must prove a ministry of death, and jealously obstruct the way of the tree of life. Carlyle’s Cæsars, Mahomets, Cromwells, Napoleons, were above all things men of a defective spiritual fibre ; in other words, their natural vigour is so much beyond the sane average, that they either obdurately resist this Divine voice altogether, or else dexterously pervert it to the authentication of their fanatical self-conceit, in which case Providence kindly adopts and tickets them as so many hardy and consummate policemen, fit to dragoon humanity into a temporary semblance of order. But the idea of confounding for a moment any policeman, much more any ecclesiastic, with a man, with God's finished work!—surely this is unworthy of Carlyle, and leaves his genius—not indeed his rhetorical, but his real genius—far below that of many men who will never make half his noise. Heaven knows that no one would quarrel with hero worship as a feature of human history, as a passing manifestation of the immortal cultus for which the human heart is primarily constructed. What one quarrels with is to see a grave sincere soul like Carlyle pining for the restoration of that sort of thing, helplessly incapable of extracting its majestic human meaning for it once for all, and so bidding it a jolly good-bye for ever. He seems at moments to have a glimpse of their being something symbolic in hero-worship, and yet he neglects the first law of symbolic hermeneutics, which is, that the symbol occupy a lower plane than the thing symbolized: for he evidently regards hero-worship in the past as prophetic only of continued hero-worship in the future: that is, he makes the symbol symbolize itself. But all this is absurd. The symbol always stands for something it cannot comprehend, something which cannot be transacted in the same region with itself. Thus viewed, hero-worship does not mean any such inconsequence as that stupid people are for ever going to gaze open-mouthed on clever Divine corporals and lieutenants occasionally raised up to further Providential ends: it means that human nature itself is to become so transfigured by its divine head, as that every man, by virtue merely of his human form, will be a conspicuous temple of Deity, and that homage consequently which we now render to the creature be turned into a cordial and joyous tribute only to manifested Deity.

E.—p. 232.

I do not complain of course that the inseparable distinction of good and evil is made too much of. No man, not an idiot, can ever fail to abhor lying, theft, adultery, and murder, as features of human conduct, nor consequently to applaud the habitual and scrupulous abnegation of these things; because our spiritual existence is conditioned upon that bipolarity, just as our physical existence is conditioned upon the bipolarity of pleasure and pain; and to suppose one indifferent therefore to moral distinctions is to suppose him spiritually non-existent, just as to suppose one indifferent to the distinction of pleasure and pain is to suppose him physically non-existent. In both spheres alike these things are the mere constitutional conditions of our existence, and what I quarrel with consequently is that they should not be left in that intensely subordinate plight, but become exalted by our foolish theologians and philosophers into the very sources also of our life. My animal consciousness is constituted by my susceptibility to pleasure and pain, or my relations to outlying nature; and this consciousness would for ever immerse me as it does the horse or the tiger, and prevent my rise to the human level, were it not for conscience acquainting me with a superior pleasure and a profounder pain, and so rescuing me from its grasp.

But if I hereupon insist upon identifying myself with these new conditions of existence, if I insist upon confounding my proper life in this new sphere with the mere organization which serves to develope it or give it manifestation, I shall practically incur the same mistake as the man who makes freedom to mean no diviner thing than emancipation from fetters, and shall remain, under my moral tutelage, even more hopelessly remote from true communion with God than I had been before as a simple animal. The animal existence is never diabolic. The human is invariably so during its transition from instinct to spontaneity, or while truth in the intellect instead of good in the heart rules the conduct. "The reason of man," says Swedenborg, Arcana Cœlestia, 1949 and 1950, "is made up of good in the heart and truth in the understanding. Good is the interior celestial element and constitutes the very soul or life of the reason: truth is the exterior spiritual element and is what receives life from that interior good. Rational truth uninspired by good is symbolized by Ishmael: it fights against all, and all fight against it. Rational good never fights, howsoever it is assailed, because it is meek and gentle, patient and accommodating, all its attributes being those of love and mercy: and although it does not fight, yet it conquers all, never thinking of combat nor boasting of victory. It acts thus because it is divine, and is safe of itself: for no evil can assault good, nor even subsist in the same region. If it feel even the approach of good, evil spontaneously recedes and retires. And what is true of good, is true in a measure, also, of truth enlivened by good, because such truth is only good in form. But truth separate from good, or unvivified by it, which is represented by Ishmael, is of a different quality. It thinks and devises scarcely anything, but combats, its ruling affection being to conquer, and when it conquers it boasts of its prowess. A man of this sort, though he be in the most orthodox truth of faith, if he be not at the same time animated by charity, is morose, impatient, querulous towards all the world, viewing every body else as in error, zealously rebuking, chastising, correcting; he is without pity, nor does he endeavour tenderly to bend the affections and thoughts of others to what he conceives to be right, [but on the contrary seeks to coerce them into his own way of thinking:] for he regards everything from the point of view of truth, nothing from the point of view of good." And yet this fine-hearted and deep-thoughted old man is of course pronounced insane by every theologic or philosophic noodle in the land.

ERRATA.

- p. 32, l. 13 from bottom, insert a colon after knowledge.
- p. 85, last line, for uncreated, read unformed.
- p. 86, l. 12 from top, strike out the second and.
- p. 124, l. 16 from top, for is, read are.

Date Due

418047

FEB 28 1990

2644YB

LBC

03-31-05 32180 LBC

164

MS

Princeton Theological Seminary Libraries

1 1012 01297 0770

